the most alluring promises and flatteries, as well as the most terrible threatenings, to prevail with Christians to apostatize and worship idols. Many were thus corrupted and did wickedly. But the real Christians were enabled to resist all these temptations, and to adhere to their religion with the most heroic constancy: and through the whole extent of the Roman empire, as well as in other places, Christianity was propagated. At the same time they were exposed to death by the sword and flame, and to be carried captive, and spoiled, for many days; for the ten persecutions of the Roman emperors lasted almost three hundred years, with only short intermissions of rest and peace. The dispersion of the apostles, teachers, and Christians, in the primitive times, by persecution, greatly promoted the promulgation of the Gospel. They understood, and were wise, and carried their wisdom with them, and instructed immense multitudes. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 34, 35. When the Jews fell under the persecutions of Antiochus, Matthias of Modin, and his son Judas Maccabeus, revolted from the persecutors; and after the death of Matthias, Judas several times vanquished the armies of Antiochus with very inferior forces: at length he recovered Jerusalem, cleansed the sanctuary, restored the worship of God, and survived Antiochus; and both the priesthood and sovereignty remained in that family for several generations. The small force of these Jewish heroes might be called "a little help:" yet in fact it proved a most effectual help. But if we advert to what succeeded the persecutions before-mentioned, we shall perceive a more unexceptionable interpretation. After the Christians had long fallen under the power of their persecutors, the conversion of Constantine gave them a deliverance: they were no longer persecuted, but favoured by the Roman emperor and his deputies. Yet this proved but a little help to the cause of true religion; it added much to the temporal prosperity of the Church, but it greatly tended to debase the character of professed Christians. Especially it caused many to cleave to them with flatteries; for hypocrisy became prevalent amongst both the clergy and laity, who were intent on flattering the emperor and those in authority, for their own interest. And indeed persecution soon revived within the Church, the different parties cruelly harassing each other by turns: and they who had most understanding in true religion were commonly most oppressed; being permitted to fall into these calamities, to try and prove them, and to distinguish them from false professors, as well as purge away their defilement and make them white. This was to continue "to the time of the end;" because it was yet for an appointed time." These expressions cannot be applied to the persecuted Jews in the days of Antiochus; for that did not bring either their calamities, or those of the Church, to an end: but the persecutions that Christians have suffered, from their professed fellow Christians, began from the days of Constantine, and have continued more or less to this day; and they will continue till the appointed time of the Jews' conversion, the ruin of every antichristian power, and the last great spread of the Gospel.

V. 36. After the Romans had stopped the progress of Antiochus in Egypt, he was no more able to do according to his will, or to exalt himself; except as he cruelly oppressed the Jews: and even in this he was finally baffled: he indeed spake marvellous things against the God of gods; but he could not be said to magnify himself against every god, for he was remarkable for his superstition and idolatry. The prophecy therefore could not receive its accomplishment in him. "Then a king shall do according to his will," &c. "Under the name king must be understood the Roman state, under what kind of government soever." (Mede.) "The prophet was speaking of the persecutions, which would be permitted for the trial of the Church, after the empire was become Christian; and now he proceeds to describe the principal author of these persecutions. After the empire was become Christian, there would spring up in the Church an antichristian power, that should—exalt itself above all laws human and divine; dispense with the most sacred and solemn obligations; and in many respects enjoin what God had forbidden, and forbid what God had commanded. This power too was to continue in the Church, and prosper, till the indignation was accomplished; for that that is determined shall be done." This must denote some particular period; otherwise it is no more than saying, that God's indignation shall not be accomplished, till it be accomplished. This is the same that was called, (viii. 19.) "the last end of the indignation;" and, (ix. 27.) "the consummation;" and it meaneth the last end of his indignation against his people, the Jews; (xii. 7.) (Bp. Newton.) St. Paul seems to have referred to this prophecy of Daniel, in his extraordinary prediction of "the Man of Sin;" and in great measure to have both sanctioned the general outlines of the above interpretation; and to have still more fully elucidated it; especially in respect of marvellous things spoken against the God of gods. (Marg. Ref.) The series of the predicted events also leads us to the same interpretations.—After the empire became Christian, a king, (or kingdom,) gradually sprang up in it, of a most absolute and tyrannical nature "doing according to his own will," with the most avowed defiance of God's laws; and requiring the most implicit obedience from men of all ranks, orders, and nations. The emperors first exercised, or excited, this power by their ecclesiastical councils: but it gradually passed into the hands of the clergy; and the bishop and church of Rome at last carried it to the most enormous height, exalting and magnifying themselves above every god. These have long prospered, and will, more or less, do so, till the Lord's indignation against his people shall be accomplished, and the determined period of the calamities of the Church be expired.

V. 37. In what sense could it be said, that Antiochus did not regard the god of his fathers, when he compelled the Jews to worship Jupiter Olympius? Or, that he regarded not the desire of women; when, besides being married, he was excessive and shameless in his indulgence of his lust, and did nothing to restrain others from the same? The desire of women and of the married life, the Roman should discountenance, when he shook off the gods of his ancestors. (Mede.) It is certain that Constantine, the first Christian emperor, in various ways discouraged marriage and honoured celibacy, thus acting in direct opposition to the ancient policy of Rome; and that the subsequent idolatry and blasphemy of the antichristian power were accompanied by a proportionable discountenancing of marriage, till it was totally prohibited to the ministers of religion. By "the desire of women," (or wives, as it may be rendered,) beyond all doubt, the desire of marriage is meant: and where on earth has any power, or government, permanently and avowedly stigmatized marriage as dishonourable, and almost idolized celibacy and virginity, except that of Rome, even from the conversion of the emperors to this day, and those who have retained some measure of her antichristianity? (Marg. Ref.) Most interpreters, however, suppose, that the virtual apostasy of the antichristian power from the true God, is meant by his "not regarding the God of his fathers."

V. 38. "For together with God, in his seat shall he honour Mahuzzim; even together with that God whom his ancestors knew not, shall he honour (them) with gold and with silver, and with precious stones, and with pleasant things." (Mede.) Mahuzzim is the plural of the word translated a fortress, a strong tower, or a rock, in very many places of Scripture. True Christians have, with David, but one Mahoz, the "Mahoz of salvations;" but apostate Christians have their many Mahuzzim. By the strange and foreign God, (38) whom the Roman should at length acknowledge, is meant Christ: for though to the Jew every strange and foreign god was a false god; yet to the Gentiles, who worshipped none but idols, the foreign God was the true. Therefore the philosophers at Athens, when St. Paul preached Christ to them, said he preached a foreign God. (Mede.) To this it may be added, that the true God was to them the UNKNOWN GOD; "whom their fathers knew not." "With this foreign God, he shall worship Mahuzzim, gods-protectors, such as saints and angels are supposed to be." (Hide.) The translation of this verse, as above given, seems far more literal than our version: and it is certain, that from the time when the Roman power began to profess the worship of the true God, and of Christ his coequal Son, (when their fathers knew not) they began to corrupt Christianity, by substituting saints and angels, as protectors and mediators, in the place of the geni and demons of paganism. They did not renounce the worship of God, or the mediation of Christ: but along with this "one God and one Lord," they worshipped "gods many and lords many;" and the reader may find in Mr. Mede's works, and in Sir Isaac Newton's observations on this prophecy, most striking instances of the early introduction of this idolatry, and the gross language used by the fathers even of the fourth century in respect of it. Mr. Mede's interpretation of this clause seems indeed well grounded; but it has not been generally admitted. "And the god Mahuzzim, in his estate he shall honour; even a god whom his fathers knew not." &c. (Bp. Newton.) But Mahuzzim is plural, and denotes towers, or fortresses; whereas the word translated god, in the second clause, is singular, and cannot mean the same with Mahuzzim; but must signify, either the true God, or some particular idol or false god.—The verse may be translated thus; "And with God, or instead of God, Mahuzzim in his estate shall he honour; even with God, or instead of God, those whom his fathers have not known shall he honour," &c. (Bp. Newton.)—If this translation be adopted, then the objects of worship, which the fathers of those concerned had not known, are the same as Mahuzzim. It should, however, be observed, that the translation or interpretation of this clause, in either way, does not in the least deduct from the certainty of the exposition in other respects. The meaning evidently is, that the worship of Mahuzzim of protectors, and guardians, instead of God, as God, or with God, is indisputably predicted, if there be any meaning in words: and the practice of the church of Rome from very early ages to this day is plainly intended; while the profusion of rich oblations, at the shrines of their saints, fully explains and illustrates the concluding part of the verse. "And who is there so little acquainted with ecclesiastical history, as not to know, that the worship of saints and angels was established both in the Greek and Latin church? They were not only invocated and adored, as patrons, intercessors, and guardians of mankind; but festival days were instituted to them, miracles were ascribed to them, churches were erected to them; their very reliques were worshipped, and shrines and images were adorned with the most costly offerings, and were honoured with gold, and silver, and with precious stones, and desirable things. And what renders the completion of the prophecy the more remarkable is, that they were adored under the title of Mahuzzim, of bulwarks, fortresses, of protectors and guardians

‘of mankind.’ (Bp. Newton.) Even the dead bodies of saints were called by the fathers of the fourth century, ‘great towers of the martyrs, fortifying cities more strongly than any impregnable wall of adamant.’ and much more to this effect. Such expressions are to be found in many ancient, and even modern, liturgies and manuals of prayers, applied to the virgin Mary, and to saints and angels: and in the eighth century this idolatrous worship was fully established by law.

V. 39. “And he shall make,” (or appoint, or prepare “for his strong-holds Mahuzzim, along with the “foreign God; to whom?” (Mahuzzim.) “acknowledging, he shall multiply honour: and he shall cause them “to rule over many, and shall divide the earth for a reward.” Thus the verse may be translated, perhaps as literally as the construction will admit of. The word rendered do, in our version, is known to have a most extensive meaning, and may well be supposed here to signify appoint or prepare: and except the preposition to, nothing varies in the least from the most literal translation in other respects; now the relative in numerous places is thus used in the Hebrew without the prefix, which is supposed to be understood. If this be admitted, then the interpretation is plain. The strong-holds of this antichristian power are his churches and monasteries, which he would consecrate to saints, or angels, or to God and his saints. Having once acknowledged the Mahuzzim, as objects of religious worship, as gods-protectors, he would honour them more and more, from age to age. He would invest them with a dominion, (as far as he could do it,) not only over men on earth, but even over those who have entered the unseen world, and induce vast multitudes to seek deliverance out of purgatory, for their deceased relations and friends, from their powerful intercession, and to purchase, at a vast expense, masses and prayers from the priests and monks for that purpose. Let it here be remembered, that this power hath invested the apostle Peter with the keys of heaven itself, that as his successor he might claim the same authority over the eternal state of mankind at large! And, finally, he would divide the earth among them. ‘St. George shall have England, St. Andrew, Scotland, St. Dennis, France, St. James, Spain, St. Mark, Venice, &c.’; and bear rule as presidents and patrons of their ‘several countries.’ (A. De.) It must be remembered, that the secular possessions of the Pope, are called St. Peter’s patrimony: and, doubtless, this dividing of the earth among the Mahuzzim was made a source of great gain, accruing from the several countries thus placed under the guardian care of these several saints.

— ‘Thus shall he do: to the defenders of Mahuzzim, “together with the strange god whom he shall acknowledge, he shall multiply honour; and he shall cause “them to rule over many, and the earth shall be divide “for a reward.” ‘The defenders and champions of “Mahuzzim were the monks, and priests, and bishops,— “and religious orders: and that they have been honoured, “and revered, and almost adored, in former ages; that “their authority and jurisdiction have extended over the “purses and consciences of men; that they have been “enriched with noble buildings and large endowments, and “have had the choicest of the lands appropriated for church “lands; are points of such public notoriety, that they re- “quire no proof?’ (Bp. Newton.) The word rendered strong-holds, may, in a figurative sense, mean defenders; as Mahuzzim (towers) may signify protectors: and thus Bishop Newton’s translation is very just, and in general the explanation is striking: but what then are we to understand by the strange god? He is here distinguished from the Mahuzzim; though the bishop’s interpretation of the preceding verse seems to make him the same. But it has been shown, that the God whom the ancestors of this power had not known, cannot be the same as the Mahuzzim; because, in both places, the word is singular, (in a language which generally has the name of God in the plural,) and must mark out some one object of worship distinct from the Mahuzzim. If, therefore, Mr. Mede’s interpretation be not admitted, perhaps that may be most entitled to attention, which supposes the worship of the consecrated bread, as if Christ were bodily present by transubstantiation, to be intended. However, whether the Mahuzzim or their defenders, (the defenders of gods-protectors!) be meant, the history of the Roman church most surprisingly verifies the prediction.

V. 40—43. Antiochus Epiphanes had no more wars with the Egyptians, after the persecutions of the Jews before stated; but ended his life in an expedition against the Persians. Nor is it likely, that the prediction should return from the times which we have been considering, to the wars of the Syrian and Egyptian kings. But rather we should expect, that the series of events would proceed, or collateral circumstances should be noticed. The kings of the north and the south were the kings of Syria and Egypt, all these kingdoms were swallowed up by the Roman empire. But at the time of the end, that is of the prosperity of that empire, when it was about to be broken to pieces, (Marg. Ref.) “the king of the south would “push at him;” this predicts, as some eminent expositors suppose, the victories of the Saracens under Mahomet and his successors; who coming from the south made war upon the eastern division of the Roman empire, and seized on several of its finest provinces: yet they did not utterly subvert it. And it is remarkable, that the doctrine of Mahomet was first forged at Mecca, and the supremacy of the pope was established by a grant from Phocas, in the very same year of Christ, 606: so that the eastern and western antichrists began their reign together, and will probably terminate them at no great distance of time from each other. But though the Saracens from the south, or Arabia, dismembered and weakened the eastern empire: yet the Turks from Scythia, a northern region, totally subverted it. This king of the north came against the king of the south, (who had subjugated the eastern part of the Roman empire,) “like a whirlwind, with chariots, and “horsemen,” of which the Turkish armies chiefly consisted: “and with many ships;” without which they could not have got possession of so many maritime countries; thus they entered and overflowed them like an inundation, and so passed over. They overspread the western parts of Asia, and then passing over into Europe, they fixed their empire at Constantinople, upon the ruins of the eastern empire, which had long before been divided from that of Rome in the west. Among other conquests, it was predicted that this king of the north would enter into the glorious land, or the land of Canaan: this the Turks did, and they are masters of it to this day. “And many “countries were by them overthrown,” as Syria and Palestine: but they were never able to subdue the Arabian tribes, or the mixed people, which inhabited the regions formerly occupied by Edom, Moab, and Ammon, whose posterity are probably now incorporated with the Ishmaelites and Midianites. These escaped them: and to this day the Ottoman emperors pay the Arabs an annual pension of forty thousand crowns, for the safe passage of their pilgrims and caravans to Mecca; and yet even this often fails of protecting them from plunder. None of this can apply to Antiochus: but especially he never conquered Egypt, Lybia, or Ethiopia: he never did any thing important, after his repulse by the Romans. But the Turkish princes stretched forth their hands to grasp these countries, and got possession of their treasures, and were enriched, and strengthened by the acquisition; carrying away also vast multitudes of the inhabitants captive to Constantinople: and these and other regions of Africa remain in their hands to this day, along with their Asiatic and European dominions. (Notes, &c. Ezek. xxix, xxx.)

V. 44, 45. All the attempts of commentators to apply this to Antiochus have proved fruitless: for though he went forth with great indignation to subdue some revolted provinces in the east and in the north; yet he never returned into Judea, which land alone can be intended by “the glorious holy mountain.” It is more probably concluded, that this part of the prophecy relates to events yet future. Some conjecture that the Persians, who border on the Turkish dominions to the east, and the Russians who lie north of them, will unite against the Turks; that in the land of Canaan the latter will fix their camp with great ostentation, as well as wage the war with great fury; and that there they shall receive such a defeat, as shall end in the utter subversion of their monarchy. But it may perhaps refer to events, which have before been mentioned, (Notes, &c. Ez. xxxviii, xxxix:) namely, the return of the Jews to their own land after their conversion, and the assistance to be given them by the Christian European powers; which tidings from the east and north must needs trouble the Turkish princes, who possess the country that is again to be restored to the Jews. And thus going forth with great fury to war against the Jews, and having pitched their camp between the Mediterranean sea and the Dead sea, in the mountains of Judea, they will be suddenly and surprisingly ruined without help or recovery. Thus the ruin of the eastern antichrist will not be far distant from that of the western; both of which seem to be predicted in this chapter. The word rendered, “to make away,” signifies to curse, and seems to intimate, that the war would be on a religious account. As, however, this part of the prophecy certainly is yet unfulfilled, we ought not too freely to indulge conjecture, where the evident meaning of the prophecy does not fully authorise our conclusions.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
 V. 1-19.

The predictions of the Scripture not only confirm the doctrines contained in it; but they tend to establish our faith in the over-ruling providence of God, which is thus sensibly demonstrated to us. Little do men in general imagine, how much even the determinations of princes and senates are influenced by the agency of good or bad spirits. In mercy to his people, the Lord employs his mighty angels to strengthen and confirm those who know him not, in every determination and measure that he sees will prove for the good of his servants: and they are thus imperceptibly directed by an external agent, when they most entirely follow their own inclinations. Whilst wealth and power animate men to engage in ambitious projects; they are sure, whether successful or not, to involve multitudes in ruin: and the projectors only continue for a few days, to act according to their own will and rule with great dominion, and then they make room for others. The debates of councils, and the solemn treaties of princes, are frequently such a mixture of dissimulation and selfishness, that they cannot endure an impartial investigation: and their most plausible schemes often terminate in most complicated disasters. But ambition, avarice, and revenge, or similar passions, still keep the world in motion; one turbulent chieftain succeeds to the estate of another; success and power continually shift sides, as well as riches and renown. Great prosperity increases men's pride, or emboldens self-indulgence; and thus tends to their ruin; and he that is a slave to his lusts, can never be strengthened, even by casting down ten thousands of his enemies. But how can kings expect to be helped by the murder of their own industrious and conscientious subjects, through cruel persecutions? By such measures they drive them into revolts, and thus many stand up against them. The vision however, will be established, and the purpose of God accomplished, let who will stand or fall. When his designs are effected, men are left to provoke such as are more powerful and proud than themselves, till they stumble and fall, and are not found.

V. 20—35.

As some monarchs have been the firebrands of the world; so others have been the mere sponges of the people, whose chief glory hath been to raise taxes from them like sordid usurers: and such have often perished by the machinations of designing men. They, whom the world calls illustrious, are often in the Lord's account vile persons; and such as obtain the honour of a kingdom, are sometimes deserving of the greatest ignominy and detestation. Whilst the potsherds of the earth strive with each other, they are properly matched: and in turn they prevail and are prevailed against, deceive and are deceived. But they commonly are ambitious of contending with the covenanted people of God, and thus they enter into an unequal contest with their Maker. When they see the Church weak and outwardly exposed, they forget that her "Redeemer is mighty:" and their natural enmity against the holy covenant of God renders them exceedingly ready to take offence, or to vent their indignation against his people, when others affront and injure them: and they will generally find apostates and hypocrites, with whom to hold intelligence in these ruinous measures. When arms stand on their part, they fear not to pollute God's sanctuary;

and to desolate Zion by their abominations; and by their flattering promises they allure wicked professors to join them. They, however, who know God will put their trust in him, and he will enable them to stand their ground, to bear their cross, and to maintain their conflict. Frequently when the Church is most wasted by persecution, it is most honoured with able preachers, and replenished with numerous converts through their instructions. But outward prosperity seldom greatly helps the cause of godliness: many at such times cleave to the people of God by flatteries, and hypocrites multiply faster than true believers. Even they that have understanding, are often left to fall into some fiery trial, to prove and purify them: but their sufferings will have an end, at the time when destruction shall overtake the workers of iniquity.

V. 36—45.

How dreadfully do the transactions of the visible church illustrate the doctrine of man's depravity! The blasphemies and impious abrogations of God's laws to make way for man's inventions; the denying of the Head, in order to worship creatures; the most diabolical pride united with voluntary humility; the most carnal and abandoned conduct cleaved under the appearance of the greatest mortification: the most lavish profusion joined with the most extreme avarice and extortion, have been found in the greatest degree among the rulers of the professedly Christian Church: but these are Antichristian abuses, which will soon come to an end, however men may now practise and prosper in them. The end of the Lord's indignation against his people, and of his patience towards his enemies, approaches: and if we would escape the ruin of the infidel, the idolater, and the superstitious and cruel persecutor, as well as that of the profane, we must make the oracles of God our standard of truth and duty, the foundation of our hope, and the light of our paths, through this dark world to the glorious inheritance above.

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1. Michael signifies, Who is like God? And this name, with the title of "the great Prince, which standeth for the children of thy people," most clearly points out the divine Saviour; and cannot properly be understood of a created angel. If the words "at that time," be referred to Antiochus's persecution, Christ stood up in his providence merely to deliver the Jews from their persecutors; if to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, his standing up may be understood of his incarnation, for the redemption of his people, and of the introduction of the Gospel-dispensation, just before those calamities began: but if we interpret at that time, to refer to the ruin of the eastern and western Antichrists, as just before predicted, then Christ will stand up in his glorious power, to terminate the afflictions of his people, and to make his cause triumphant over all opposition; (Marg. Ref.) the time of trouble here mentioned, cannot be understood of the persecutions of the Jews by Antiochus; for the Babylonish captivity was preceded and attended by far greater and more durable calamities: but if we understand it to include all that the Jews have suffered from their crucifixion of Christ to the present day, and all that yet remains for them to suffer, till their conversion to Christ; then doubtless their afflictions during their bondage in Egypt, or during the Babylonish captivity, and all their other persecutions from the beginning to the coming of Christ, were very light in the comparison. Yet there were in the apostles' days, and have been since in every age, "a remnant according to the election of grace," who have been preserved from their national sin of unbelief, and from the punishments which have been inflicted on them for it. Nay, the unbelieving progenitors have been spared for the sake of those chosen ones, that were in due time to descend from them: and so every one hath been and will be delivered, who is found written in the book of God's secret purposes as his elect; or in the register of true believers, when those purposes are made known by the event.

V. 2, 3. As these verses conclude the series of prophetic events, which have been deduced from the days of Daniel to the complete setting up of Christ's kingdom on earth; it seems obvious to interpret them of the general resurrection. Whether we attempt to explain them, as figuratively meaning the deliverance of the Jews from Antiochus's persecution, or of their conversion to Christ in the primitive times, or of the first resurrection spoken of by St. John; we shall not know what to understand by the many, that "should awake to everlasting shame and contempt." For admitting that hypocrites do enter the visible Church with true believers at every revival, yet their profession of faith cannot be an "awaking to everlasting shame and contempt." The awaking also of those, that sleep in the dust, is very different from the resurrection of the souls, mentioned by St. John, (Note, Rev. xx. 4); and the language so accords with that of the New Testament respecting the general resurrection, that it must be expounded of it as the closing event of all, when that which is determined shall be done. The word rendered many, may signify the multitude, &c.; or if we retain our translation, we may consider it as similar to that of St. Paul, "by one man's disobedience, many were made sinners." No doubt then the resurrection of the dead, the day of judgment, and the eternal state of retribution, are here predicted; and that everlasting shame and contempt, as well as torment and misery, which will be the lot of the wicked. But besides the happiness of the righteous, which is mentioned in general terms, those things are added which seem restrictively to mark out faithful ministers, (Note, xi. 32, 33.) They are wise, both for their own salvation, and to win souls; wise teachers of divine truth, and shall shine as the brightness of the firmament. "They turn many unto righteousness," or justify many; teaching them the way in which sinners are justified and sanctified by faith in Christ; and in recompense of their diligence and faithfulness, they shall be as stars for ever and ever. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. The angel, by way of conclusion, intimated to Daniel, that this prophecy would remain obscure and as a sealed book, of which little would be understood, till the time of the end; i. e. till the things predicted drew to a conclusion. The fact hath evidenced this to be the case: vast difficulties have always been acknowledged in many of Daniel's prophecies, and they have been as words shut up even from believers in general. But "at the time of the end many should run to and fro, and knowledge would be increased." In these latter ages many have bestowed great pains, in searching into history to illustrate those parts of these prophecies that are already accomplished, and in comparing them with other scriptures, to form some judgment of what yet remains to be fulfilled: and thus much light has been thrown on them. As they shall gradually be more and more accomplished, they will be better understood, and future generations will be more surprised and instructed by them than we are. The latter expression of of running to and fro, may refer to the future spread of the Gospel, by the active labours of faithful ministers, which will make way for the fulfilment of the remaining prophecies, by increasing in the world the knowledge of divine truth,

V. 5-9. When the angel had finished his discourse, Daniel was led to look around him, and he saw two other angels, one on each side of the river Tigris. He saw also "upon," or rather above, "the waters of that river, a man clothed in linen;" this was doubtless Christ our spotless High-Priest; who ruleth over many people, of which sitting or standing upon waters is an emblem. One of the attending angels asked him, "How long it was to be to the end of these wonders?" In answer to which inquiry, He lifted up both his hands to heaven, as swearing by the eternal JEHOVAH, that it would be for a time, times, and a half. This is the same period, that we before met with; (vii. 25;) and which we shall repeatedly find in the Revelation of St. John. It signifies three years and a half, or twelve hundred and sixty days. These are to be calculated from the time when the king, before prophesied of, began to scatter the power of the holy people, until that scattering shall be accomplished; for then all these things will be finished. This period must not be calculated from the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the subsequent dispersion of the Jews; for they then ceased to be the holy people: but from the time, when the anti-christian usurpers began to scatter the power of true christians, by false doctrines, persecutions, massacres, and religious wars, to the approaching period when these powers shall be subverted. It has been seen, that the imposture of Mahomet, and the papal usurpation, began about the same time; and we may allow both to be included, as a twofold attack upon the Church under the secret direction of the devil and his angels. When Daniel heard this, he found that he did not understand it: and he therefore made further inquiries respecting it; and was again reminded, that the words were to be closed, and sealed up to the time of the end.

What shall, &c.? Or as Mr. Mede translates the words, "What are these latter times, thou speakest of?" Be content with what has been made known unto thee: for the fuller explication of the prophecy is deferred to the time of its accomplishment. (Louth.)

V. 10. During the long-continued troubles of the church, the Lord intended to carry on his work, and to purify and sanctify a great multitude, even by means of these trials: and whilst the wicked would practise their wickedness without remorse, and none of them would understand the meaning of these prophecies; they would gradually be unveiled to the wise and righteous, by the concurrent teaching of the Holy Spirit, and the accomplishment of them in Providence. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11-13. The taking away of the daily sacrifice, and the abomination that maketh desolate, seem to be expressions applied to various different events of a similar nature. When Antiochus put a stop to the temple-worship, and set up his idols, they were in some sense accomplished; and also when the Romans destroyed the temple, and terminated its worship, and left the holy city to be inhabited by idolaters: but they are here evidently applied to the establishment of idolatry and persecution within the church, by the tyranny of Antichrist. These twelve hundred and ninety days: must be calculated from the same time as the three years and a half before-mentioned; and the thirty years beyond them. The subversion of the kingdom of Antichrist, and the destruction of the seat of the beast, (Rev. xviii. xix.) will probably be at the end of the twelve hundred and sixty years; thirty years more may be taken up in wholly extirpating the Antichristian powers; and the last number of thirteen hundred and thirty years, which reaches forty-five years beyond that time, may predict the complete introduction of the millennium, when the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea: and happy will they be, who wait and live to see that time. Without doubt this period is approaching, and not very far distant: though I dare not hazard an opinion about the exact time whence these years are to be dated. Daniel having received thus much information, was to prepare for death and rest in heaven, for he would stand in his lot, as a glorified saint, to witness the accomplishment of these predictions. Let any one carefully compare the terms and dates in these two concluding chapters of Daniel, with the scriptures referred to in the margin, and it is probable, that he will no longer doubt, but the prophet Daniel, and the apostle John in Revelation, spake of the same transactions. What an amazing prophecy is this, comprehending so many various events, and extending through so many successive ages; from the first establishment of the Persian empire, about five hundred and thirty years before Christ, to the general resurrection! How much nobler and more exalted the sense, more important and more worthy to be known by men, and to be revealed by God, when taken in this extended view, and applied to this long and yet regular series of affairs, by the most easy and natural construction; than when confined and limited to the times and 'actions of Antiochus, to whom yet it cannot be reconciled by the most strained and unnatural interpretation!' (Bp. Newton.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

Our glorious Prince and Saviour, who once appeared on earth to make atonement for our sins, and who now is at the right hand of the Father, as our Advocate to plead our cause; will be sure to stand up in behalf of his people in the extremity of their trials and temptations, and to make them triumphant over all their enemies: nor can any troubles prevent the everlasting felicity of a single person, whose name is written in the book of life. But none of our deliverances will be complete till that hour cometh, when, "all that are in the graves, shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and shall come forth, they that have done good, to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation." At that decisive season, when the multitude of the wicked shall not only be the objects of disdain and abhorrence to the righteous Judge of all and his saints and angels, without any mixture of compassion or mercy, but shall even loathe and despise each other; the righteous shall obtain glory, honour, immortality, and eternal life. Let us then seek wisdom and righteousness, resist temptation manfully, bear up under troubles cheerfully, and wait for a happy issue of all our conflicts and sorrows. But what special encouragement may the faithful preachers of the Gospel derive from this subject, amidst all their fatigues and difficulties, and the contempt and persecution which they encounter in this evil world! For they are truly wise, and shall shine in glory as the brightness of the firmament; and every one, whom they are the instruments of turning unto righteousness, will be an addition to their crown of glory and rejoicing in the day of Christ. Let us "not then be weary of well doing, for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."

V. 4—13.

If we be enabled to obtain a well grounded assurance of eternal happiness, and be diligently employed in our

proper work; we may be satisfied, though a part of the sacred Scriptures should be sealed up from us: for God hath so ordered it, that some things are to be closed from our view, and reserved for the use of future generations. However, we should not be willingly ignorant of any part of revelation, but should with modesty and humility, bestow much pains to understand and explain the sacred oracles, that knowledge may be increased: and when many are thus employed, some will discover one thing, and some another, and the whole will become better understood. And may the Lord send forth many preachers, "who may run to and fro all over the earth;" to guide those who sit in darkness, into the ways of truth and righteousness!—Our Lord and Saviour, who ruleth over the raging of the waters and the madness of the people, is the sole Proprietor of this knowledge: even angels, when they desire to look down and inquire into the affairs of his Church, seek all their information from him; and he gives his servants on earth wisdom and knowledge, answerable to their occasions. We should then apply to him continually for instruction; what he communicates we should thankfully receive; but we should inquire no further into those things which he conceals. We know in general that the prevalence of his enemies, to scatter the power of his saints, hath an appointed period: and that he is continually "purifying to himself a peculiar people zealous of good works," even when wickedness most abounds and prospers: that all the trials of believers, yea, and all their temptations too, (though they often for the moment blacken and defile them,) shall eventually combine to purify and make them white: and that when persecution stops the public administration of divine ordinances, and idolatry renders the visible Church an abomination and a desolation; yet still there is a scattered, or hidden remnant, who are wise to understand the ways of God, which none of the wicked can understand.—But glorious times approach. Happy will they be, who live to see them! yea, happy are believers at all times! they rest in God by faith now, and a rest is reserved for them in heaven at last. They may then cheerfully look forward to a dying hour; when the Lord will bid them depart in peace, for their eyes have seen, and their hearts have experienced his salvation; they may expect to rest in their happy lot in the end of their days; and in heaven to share the triumphs of the Church on earth, which they here foresaw, longed, and prayed for, but did not live to witness.

BOOK OF HOSEA.

The twelve remaining prophecies have long been considered as one book. It is thought, that St. Stephen referred to this arrangement, when, quoting a passage from Amos, he says, "As it is written in the book of the prophets:" (Acts vii. 42.) And it is certain, that in the first ages of Christianity, both Jews and Christians numbered up the books of the Old Testament, according to it. This may help to show what those books were, to which Christ and his apostles referred, as The Scriptures, and The oracles of God. The writers of this part of Scripture are generally called THE MINOR PROPHETS; not that their writings were inferior in excellency or authority to the larger works of the other prophets: but merely on account of their brevity. They do not seem to be placed exactly after the order in which the prophets delivered them. Nine of them prophesied before the captivity, three prophesied after the Jews were returned from Babylon; and some of the former were as early, or more so, than the prophet Isaiah; especially Jonah, who evidently preceded all the others. As to the rest, the various schemes formed, and the different opinions held, by very learned men, and the slender grounds on which in some cases they rest their opinions, show that it is a subject of more difficulty than use. The dates affixed to each prophecy and its several parts must suffice here.

It may be supposed that these prophets, and many who wrote nothing, were eminent and useful preachers of righteousness to their own generations; and perhaps some of them did more service in their own time, than those who have left more behind them for the benefit of posterity: at least the Lord generally dispenses his gifts and services in this manner.

Hosea, whose prophecy we now enter upon, exercised his sacred office for a great many years: he predicted the captivity of the ten Tribes long before it arrived, yet he probably lived to witness its near approach. He is supposed to have been of the kingdom of Israel, though his prophecies frequently relate to Judah also. His style is remarkably concise, sententious, and unconnected, though some parts are peculiarly pathetic, animated, and sublime. His general scope was to convince his people of their exceeding sinfulness, and to warn them by the terror, and lead them by the goodness, of God to repentance. His prediction of events which soon took place, are numerous: but those relating to the state of Israel and Judah, for many ages; the conversion of the Gentiles; and the future restoration of the Jews, are peculiarly distinct and striking; they coincide with those of the other prophets; and the extraordinary fulfilment of several, both prove the divine inspiration of the writer, and gives assurance that the rest will in due time be accomplished. Considering the brevity of this prophecy, few parts of the Old Testament are more fully attested, by quotations, or clear references, in the New. (Comp. i. 10, 11. ii. 23. Rom. ix. 25, 26. 1 Pet. ii. 10.—vi. 6. Matt. ix. 13.—x. 8. Luke xxiii. 30. Rev. vi. 16.—xi. 1. Matt. ii. 15.—xiii. 14. 1 Cor. xv. 54, 55.) Very strong language has been used, by some learned men, on the corrupt state in which the original text of the minor prophets in general, and of Hosea in particular, has been sent down to us; and abundant corrections, some on but slender authority, others purely conjectural; some where they might seem to render the sense more clear, others where, to me at least, they appear to render it more obscure, have been proposed. But this method, if freely encouraged, is a desperate remedy: it tends to add to, and take from, the word of God, and to substitute the conjectures of men, in the place of his infallible oracles. In a few instances, with great caution and sobriety, on the united authority of manuscripts and versions, a slight alteration may be admissible: but in general, it is probable, that the humble, diligent, and pious student of Scripture will find, that the text as it now stands, contains in every part an important and instructive meaning. Industry, (with earnest prayer,) in endeavouring to understand the sacred oracles, in their present state, would perhaps do more to render the meaning of them intelligible, explicit, and impressive, than all the labour which is taken to correct and improve the text: and if at last, a few passages remained obscure, or ambiguous, this would by no means be of such bad consequence, as conjectural alterations, or alterations on dubious authority.

The translation of this prophecy, likewise, has been much complained of: and perhaps some passages are less exactly and clearly rendered, than usual. But it is no easy matter to give an unexceptionable version to so concise an ancient book, which is on many accounts peculiarly difficult: and it is very doubtful, whether, all things considered, a better translation could at present be made, than that which we already possess; at least such attempts, in this and other instances, do not appear to have been very successful.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. This is the general title of the book: Hosea wrote The word that came to him from the LORD. His name is the same as Joshua, or Jesus, except as these are compounded with the first syllable of the word JEHOVAH. It signifies salvation. All the kings of Judah, that succeeded each other during Hosea's ministry, are mentioned: but Jeroboam of Israel alone, under whose reign he began to prophesy; for after Jeroboam's death the affairs of Israel fell into the utmost confusion. (Notes, 2 Kings xiv. 21. xv. 8.) If we suppose, that the prophet exercised his ministry for a few of the last years of Jeroboam, and of the first of Hezekiah, we shall find that he laboured in the work nearly 70 years, and must have lived to a very great age. No information is given of the time in which he delivered any one of his predictions.

V. 2. 3. The prophet was called to enter on his prophetic office in a very remarkable manner. When he was, as it seems, a very young man, he was commanded by the Lord, to marry a wife of whoredoms, one notorious for that vice, and whose children would be considered as children of whoredoms. This was intended to be an emblem of the Lord's dealings with the idolatrous Israelites, whom he had espoused to himself. And accordingly Hosea married Gomer the daughter of Diblaim. It hath been much disputed, whether this was done in reality or in vision; or whether it were any thing more than a parable that he spake to the people. But it seems to be taking an unauthorized liberty with Scripture, to explain narrative into vision, or parable, without absolute necessity, or any intimation of it in the text. If we consider it as a reality, many difficulties remain to be obviated. It is argued that it would have been inconsistent with the prophet's character, to marry a notoriously bad woman: and therefore some have conjectured, that she was previously reformed, (as Rahab the harlot had been, before she was married to Salmon;) others imagine, that she bore a good character when the prophet married her, but afterwards became a wife of whoredoms, and her children were brought under the suspicion of being children of whoredoms: and this is more plausible than the former, which by no means accords to the thing signified. But perhaps it may be shown, that it was not unlawful or immoral for the prophet to marry a licentious woman, on such an occasion. Some restrictions were laid upon the priests in these respects, but he was not concerned in them; Gomer was an Israelite, and not included in the prohibitions of intermarrying with Gentiles. The rule in the New Testament, of believers marrying only in the Lord, was doubtless always obligatory, as to the spirit of it, in ordinary cases; because most important consequences depend on it: but, (like the laws against the marriages of near relations,) though generally and highly expedient, it cannot be deemed of immutable and indispensable obligation; for cases may be imagined, in which it must be violated, or other moral laws of God be broken. The express command of God would suffice to authorize any deviations from ordinary rules, which were not of immutable and moral obligation; and it is impossible, that he should actually command an immoral action; though he might command what otherwise would be wrong for a man to do, as the extirpation of the Canaanites, men, women, and children. So that it might not only be lawful for the prophet thus to marry, but his bounden duty; and to bear the heavy cross that it would lay on him. As the Israelites were idolatrous in Egypt, before their national espousals to the Lord at mount Sinai, as well as afterwards; so that they were, through their successive generations unto him, as a wife of whoredoms, and children of whoredoms: it would form a more affecting picture of God's unmerited goodness and unwearied patience, and of their perverseness and ingratitude, by which they grieved, wearied him out, and dishonoured him, if we take it literally, than if we adopt any other interpretation of it. A man, who had a wife, that both before and after marriage was guilty of incontinence, would be ready to look upon her children with suspicion, and to consider them as children of whoredoms; and others would be apt to think the same; this was the case of the Lord respecting the people of Israel; and it will perhaps afterwards appear, that the conduct of the prophet exactly pictured that of God to Israel, with respect to his past, and present, and predicted future dealings, with that favoured but ungrateful nation.

V. 4, 5. (Notes, 2 Kings x. 29—31.) Gomer, the name of Hosea's wife, signifies consumption. This might in general denote the ruin of the nation for their idolatries: and the names, which God commanded the prophet to give her children referred to the different gradations, by which that ruin would come upon them. — Jezeel was the city where Jehu smote the family of Ahab: the name signifies, the seed of God, or the arm of God, or scattered by God, as seed is when sown: Jehu had executed judgment on Ahab's family, and was recompensed for that service, by the continuance of the kingdom in his family to the fourth generation. But his subsequent conduct evinced, that he was actuated by selfish motives in all that he did; the ambition, cruelty, and hypocrisy, of which he was then guilty, were to be avenged on his house, after their subsequent idolatry and iniquity had ripened them for this destruction; and then the kingdom would speedily cease from the house of Israel. This was predicted towards the close of the reign of Jeroboam the grandson of Jehu, whose son Zechariah was soon murdered by Shallum, who usurped the throne: and from that time the history of the kingdom of Israel contains little else than conspiracies, murders, and usurpations; till it was subverted by the Assyrians, and the people were scattered of God through the various provinces of the Assyrian empire. Perhaps some fatal battle was afterwards fought in the valley of Jezreel, in which the Assyrians brake the bow, or destroyed the military force, of the kingdom of Israel.

V. 6, 7. The daughter, which Gomer next bare, has been considered as an emblem of the enfeebled state of Israel, after the fall of Jehu's family: her name signifies Not having received mercy, and implied that God would finally cast off the kingdom of Israel, as a separate people, and no more show them the special mercy that he bears to his chosen inheritance. But at the same time he promised to have mercy on Judah, and to save them by the LORD their God, and not by the weapons of war. Some explain this of the deliverance of Judah from the Assyrian invasion, by the miraculous destruction of Sennacherib's army: others of their return from captivity, by the Lord's powerfully inclining the heart of Cyrus to release them. But we should not lose sight of the great salvation by the LORD their God, when he was manifested in the flesh to effect by himself that spiritual redemption, of which all the temporal deliverances of his people were no more than types and shadows. Of this salvation all the prophets wrote; the Jewish nation was continued in possession of their privileges till this Horn of salvation was raised up among them. His victories were obtained, not by bow or sword, but by his precious blood and powerful grace: and he will at last save the Jews, and recover them from their present dispersions; for which purpose, they are evidently reserved from age to age a separate people, whilst the Israelites have either been incorporated among them, or among the Gentiles.

rael had not sought or obtained mercy, God would no longer own them as his people; they would be left to renounce entirely his worship, and he would utterly cast them out of his special protection. Yet he would not break his promise made to their fathers: the numbers of the Israelites would still be as the sand of the sea. Vast multitudes of their tribes would be joined to the Jews, or converted along with them to Carist; and the innumerable millions of the Gentiles, that should become the children of God by faith in Jesus Christ, would be indeed the true Israel and the seed of Abraham, as united to that one Seed to whom the promises were made. So that, in the places where it had heretofore been said, that the inhabitants were not God's people, there would many be addressed as the children of the living God. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11. This may refer to the union of the Israelites with the Jews, who came up under Zerubbabel after the captivity: they were not divided as before, but appointed themselves one head, or captain and ruler over them all. Or it may relate to the conversion of the Israelites as well as the Jews to Christ, in the primitive times: or rather to that future period, when the Jews, and all the Israelites that are incorporated with them, shall gather together, and submit to Christ, as their Head of authority, direction, protection, and influence; and so come up out of the land of their captivity: for as the scattering of the people by the Lord hath been great and long; so the day of their being gathered from their dispersion shall be very glorious, which seems to be intended by "the day of Jezreel."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It would seldom be expedient, and sometimes it would not be lawful, for us to exercise all that tenderness, compassion, and liberal kindness to those, who grossly violate their relative and social engagements, which the Lord shows to us, after all our ingratitude, unfaithfulness, and misbehaviour to him: but he hath provided a method, in which to display the honour of his justice and holiness, whilst his grace abounds to the chief of sinners. We should be ready to bear any cross in our persons, or in domestic and relative life, which the Lord pleases to appoint for us. He has a right to our implicit submission; our sharpest trials are far less than our deservings; and he can make up all losses to us, and comfort us in the most disquieting circumstances. That situation may become safe and easy to us, when the Lord appoints it for us, which would have been intolerable and perilous, if we had thrust ourselves into it: and when we are obedient to God's commands, we may trust our characters with him, and venture all consequences: even though we act contrary to the general sentiments of mankind in ordinary cases.— We should any of us be broken and wearied out, with half that perverseness from others, with which we try the patience and grieve the Spirit of our God: nor can any event in life sufficiently illustrate his long-suffering and mercy to his people, and their base and ungrateful conduct to him. But, though the upright soul, who loathes and mourns over his sins, may still hope in that mercy, which he is conscious of having abused; yet let the proud, hypocritical, and hardened rebel beware. His specious and hollow services will have their reward; but his pride and hypocrisy will meet with their merited punishment: and though avarice, ambition, and iniquity may for a time advance a man's family, or even promote the prosperity of a nation; yet they will at length bring down a load of vengeance, which will scatter or sink them in infamy and ruin. The Lord's mercy is infinite and everlasting towards them that fear him: but it hath its limits, in respect of impenitent sinners and guilty nations; the time approaches when he will no more have mercy on them for ever; and dreadful will be the case of those who shall not have obtained mercy, when death shall summon them to God's tribunal! But the salvation of the righteous is of the Lord: he saves them by his own mercy, truth, and power, from guilt and sin, from Satan and this present world, and from all their enemies, that they may "serve him in righteousness and true holiness before him, all the days of their lives;" and they need fear no dangers, who have God for their "Shield and exceeding great Reward." Though many of his professed people have been cast off, and he would no more be their God; yet the number of his true Israel can never be known. Blessed be his name, that in our land, of which it might once have been said, "Ye are not my people," it may now be said of numbers, "Ye are the children of the living God." May it be truly said of the writer, and every reader of these Observations: Let us then join ourselves to his worshippers, and enlist under the banner of our appointed Head; that with one accord we may leave the land of our captivity, and march forward to the Canaan above; celebrating as we proceed the glory of our Redeemer, the greatness of our deliverance, our invaluable privileges, and our joyful prospect. And let us pray for the approach of that glorious day, when the scattered Jews shall gather themselves to Christ, and be again numbered amongst his seed, his true Israel; and when there shall be "one Lord and his name One," through all the nations of the earth.

“ it should be said, Ye are the children of the living God ;” which has been explained of the calling of the Gentiles and the dispersed Israelites into the Church ; and the Jews are here exhorted to acknowledge them as brethren, and to call them Ammi, or “ my people,” and Rahamah, or “ having obtained mercy.” They were required to treat all as brethren and sisters, who had obtained mercy, and were become God’s people ; and to congratulate them on their admission to this happy estate. (Marg. Ref.) It may also intimate that when Israel should be cast off from being God’s peculiar people, there would still be found a remnant, to whom his servants might thus address themselves, at the time when the prophet wrote, and when the Jewish nation was rejected after the coming of Christ.—Some expositors interpret this of the general restoration of the Jewish nation ; but St. Paul evidently quotes the passage referred to, as a prediction of the calling of the Gentiles. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2--5. While the servants of God were directed to own, as brethren, the converted Gentiles, and the restored of Israel ; they were called on to plead in the name of God with their mother, or the Church and nation of Israel. When the prophets protested against idolatry, and the pious remnant separated from the idolaters, though their kings, princes, and priests, and the bulk of the nation were of that number ; they then pleaded with their mother. When Christ and his apostles severely reprov'd the chief priests, scribes, pharisees, and the nation in general, and foretold their rejection and the calling of the Gentiles, they pleaded with their adulterous mother, and took the Lord’s part against her : and by encouraging penitent publicans, harlots, Samaritans, and Gentiles, they said to their brethren, Ammi, and to their sisters, Rahamah. It might be deemed unprofitful for sons to plead against their mother ; yet the honour of their God and Father on this occasion required it. She was therefore to be reminded, that the Lord no longer considered her as his wife, or himself as her Husband ; and that he would proceed to execute judgment on her, unless she repented and reformed. This was expressed, by “ putting away her whoredoms out of her sight, and her adulteries from between her breasts,” &c. : and it implied a command, to put away all the idols from the land, and to avoid whatever might tempt them or others to that crime ; and to pull down as it were the idols that were set up in their hearts. If this were not done immediately, the Lord threatened, that he would “ strip her naked, &c. ;” that is, he would deprive the people of all their honourable distinctions and desirable advantages, and reduce them to the most abject, contemptible, and miserable condition, similar to their bondage in Egypt, in the infancy of the nation ; and would leave them, as in a wilderness, to perish with hunger and thirst. Nor would he show mercy to their children ; for they were born of idolaters, brought up in idolatry, and even dedicated to idols : and therefore God regarded them as “ children of whoredoms.” And indeed what else could be expected of them, when their mother had been so abandoned as to run into the most shameful practices ? For the people in general ascribed their temporary plenty and prosperity to the bounty of their idols ; and were emboldened to go on in the abominable worship of them, by abounding in every thing which they could abuse to sensuality. Thus the heathens used to worship one imaginary deity as the giver of their corn, another as the giver of their wine, or of their fruit, &c. : and in the festivals kept in honour of these idols they ran into the most shameful excesses. ‘ By lovers are meant, in the first place, the idols with which the Israelites committed spiritual fornication, (Jer. iii. 1) : and then the idolatrous nations, whose alliance they courted, and in order to it practised their idolatries.’ (Louth.) There seems no sufficient evidence for interpreting this chapter exclusively of the ten tribes, as many expositors do.

V. 6, 7. The Lord did not intend to cast off all the seed of Israel ; and therefore, speaking of the nation in general, he declared his purpose of keeping them from sinking into universal idolatry. Whilst the infatuated harlot was bent on following after her lovers ; he was resolved to make a thorn-hedge across her road, through which she could not pass without greatly tearing herself ; nay, to build a wall which she could not get over to find her paths. So that, though she attempted to follow her lovers, she should not overtake them, &c. That is, the Lord would so punish his people by heavy judgments, as to preserve them from total idolatry; so that whilst numbers would perish, a remnant would be cured of that sin.

 When the ten tribes were carried into Assyria and the Jews to Babylon, neither their idols nor their idolatrous allies could do them any good; and not being able to overtake them, or to find protection and deliverance from them; they would be convinced of their folly, in forsaking the living God for dead idols, their first Husband, for these worthless lovers; and so coming to themselves, they would be led to return home, to repent, to seek reconciliation, and re-admission to their former privileges. This seems immediately to predict the restoration of the Jews and many Israelites with them, from the Babylonish captivity, when they were effectually cured of gross idolatry: but the future conversion of the nation may also be intended.

V. 8, 9. The people did not understand, consider, or acknowledge, that the Lord gave them all their temporal mercies; and this forgetfulness exposed them to be tempted to abuse them in sacrifices, oblations, or vestments, prepared for Baal, and other idols. To convince them of this, the Lord intended to resume his grant; it had been but a loan to them, which he would recover by distraining upon them for it, seeing they had thus most evidently forfeited
 it. 'At the very season when she expects to receive the 'fruits of the earth, her enemies shall invade her and de'stroy them.' (Loath.)

V. 10-13. God himself determined to cause all the nations, whose idols Israel had worshipped, to witness their wickedness and shame; nor should any deliver them from deserved punishment. The Israelites observed festivels in honour of their idols: yet they seem to have paid regard to some of those appointed in the law, and to have made them seasons of carnal mirth and sensual indulgence; and the Jews came from the worship of idols, to celebrate them at the temple, (Jer. vii. 9, 10.) But the Lord would turn their mirth into mourning; when by his desolating judgments he destroyed all their vines and fig-trees, which they vainly supposed were given them by their idols, as a recompense for worshipping them. Thus he would visit on the nation the sins of all those days and years, during which they had worshipped Baalim, or idols;

 when they had resembled an adulteress, that adorns herself with her most costly attire at the expense of her injured husband, that she may be the more agreeable to her vile paramours; for they were entirely forgetful of the authority of God and their obligations to him. Jehu had "destroyed Baal out of Israel;" but the people had substituted other idols in his place; and so had filled up the measure of their fathers' crimes. It is probable, that the idolaters adorned themselves with great care, as well as wore peculiar garments, when worshipping their idols, (2 Kings x. 22.) 'By showing how harlots trim themselves to please others, he declareth that superstitious
 'idolaters set a great part of their religion in decking
 'themselves on their holy days.'

V. 14-17. The preceding prophecies were fulfilled in the captivities of Israel and Judah, (and perhaps in the present dispersion of the Jews.) But when these judgments had prepared the way, the Lord intended to deal with them in a more gentle manner. He would allure, or persuade, them to return to him, by invitations and hopes of reconciliation and felicity; he would thus draw them off from carnal pleasures and confidences, and make all their former delusions to vanish: so that they would see themselves in a barren wilderness, and exposed to inevitable ruin, except the Lord helped them; as was the case with their fathers in the wilderness: and when they should thus be reduced to despair of help, he would speak comfortably to them, and encourage them to trust in his mercy, grace, and providence. Thus he would, from that destitute and forlorn condition, restore them to the possession of their former privileges; as if fruitful vineyards were suddenly given in a barren wilderness: and the valley of Achor, or Trouble, (where Achan was stoned, in which Israel had fallen before his enemies, would be for a door of hope; preparing them for mercy, by humbling them and leading them to renounce their idols, and seek help from God alone. This valley was also one of the first acquisitions of Israel in Canaan, and an encouraging earnest of their possessing the whole. Thus being delivered from all their enemies and sorrows, they would sing praises with joyful hearts, as their fathers had done before, when they saw the Egyptians dead upon the sea shore. From that time they would be more cordially attached to the Lord than ever: no longer calling him Baali, or my Lord and Master, aluding to the authority, rather than the affection of a husband; but Isai, which is the language of cordial affection, in a woman speaking to her husband. For, the abuse of the word Baalim in the worship of their idols should lead to a total disuse of it, so that it should no more be remembered or employed by them. (Marg. Ref.) This may primarily foretel their restoration from the Babylonish captivity: yet it may also be applied to the conversion of the Jews and Israelites to Christ, in the apostolic days, and to the future conversion of that nation. Perhaps the incarnation of Christ may be referred to, in the name here mentioned, I-hi, My Husband, or literally Man. (Is. xxxii. 1, 2.)

V. 18-20. When the people were weaned from idols, and attached in love and faithfulness to the worship of the Lord; he would then not only renew his covenant with them, but he would make a covenant in their behalf with the beasts of the field, &c.; that is, he would take care that no creature should do them any harm, and that all should concur in doing them good. Their land was occupied by the beasts of the field, during the captivity, when it had been desolated by war: but he would afterwards rid the country of these creatures, and defend it from invaders, and make it a quiet and secure habitation for them. Nay, he would betroth them to himself, as their Husband, their kind Friend, Protector, and Companion, in the most solemn and public manner: he would engage the honour of his righteousness, wisdom, loving-kindness, mercy, and truth, for their security; employ these attributes for their good, and glorify himself in his dealings with them; he would communicate to them "wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption;" he would enrich, ennoble, adorn, and rejoice them, with all the comforts and blessings of the marriage-relation; and perform all his precious promises to them: and thus he would cause them to know him as their Lord and God. - This can only be understood, in its highest sense, of the conversion of the Jews to Christ; and of the inestimable blessings and privileges of the spiritual Israel, of all true believers, to which they are admitted by faith in Christ, and union with him; and a participation of his righteousness, unsearchable riches, and mediatorial blessings.

Know, &c. 'Thou shalt find that I am, and will be, a gracious Lord unto thee.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 21-23. When this happy change should take place in Israel's condition, that had before been so desolate and perilous, all things in heaven and earth would contribute to their advantage. This is represented in very bold figurative language: the heavens are introduced as beseeching the Lord to fill their clouds with water to water the land, and he promises to hear them: the earth is represented as calling on the heavens to pour down rain, and they hear; the fruits of the ground call also on the earth to furnish them with supplies, and are heard; and these again regard the desires and wants of Jezreel, or that people, who had been the seed of God, yet by him scattered, but are now to be gathered to him. All nature seems here alive and active in helping the converted Jews; and the supply of their spiritual wants, in answer to the prayers of the people and ministers of Christ, and through the ordinances of his appointment, may also be thus typified. The dispersion of the Jews would at length prove like the scattering of seed upon the earth, in order to a large increase; for God would, through them, or by means of his believing people, who are dispersed as seed in the earth.) "have mercy on them, who had not obtained mercy," and gather those among his people, that had not before owned him as their God. This is applied by the apostles to the conversion both of Jews and Gentiles to Christ: and we may suppose, that the latter part of the chapter refers to that restoration of Israel, which shall be as life from the dead to the nations of the earth. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

We should own and love all these as brethren, whom the Lord appears to have put among his children: and encourage them with the consideration, that they have obtained mercy, and are become the people of God. But the ministers of Christ must not connive at the abuses or crimes of that religious community, which claims the authority and stands in the relation to them, of a mother: for the glory of God, and the interests of his truth and righteousness should be far nearer to our hearts, than the credit or favour of our fellow-creatures, however related to us or advanced above us. And indeed every Christian ought by his example, profession, and conversation, to protest against the superstitions, errors, or abuses of that Church to which he belongs, or from which he hath been brought forth: for eminently pious persons, are sometimes raised up within those corrupt Churches, which God is about to give up to destruction; on purpose to bear testimony against them, and call men to repentance, that a remnant may be preserved or rescued from the contagion that hath infected the rest. If men would escape sin and condemnation, they must put all occasions of evil out of sight, repress the rising sinful inclinations of the heart, and shun whatever may be a temptation to them, or render them temptations to others. Impenitent sinners will soon be stripped of all their abused advantages and worldly prosperity, and exposed to the utmost shame, contempt, and misery: and they who have trained up their children in impiety, iniquity, or false religion, cannot reasonably expect, that God will confer spiritual blessings upon them. Such men often ascribe their temporal enjoyments to their sins or idols, and thus are emboldened to more iniquity: whereas the Lord "giveth us all things richly to enjoy," and the devil tempts men to consume them upon their lusts.—When we are infatuated by the violence of any headstrong passion, or harassing temptation, and bent upon the gratification of our depraved inclinations; it is a special mercy to have our way hedged up with thorns, or closed by some unsurmountable wall, that we may not be able to overtake our beloved idols and pleasures: and if pain, sickness, or calamity keep us from sin, we should be thankful for it.—Every gracious soul will habitually prefer suffering to sin: and it is even a mercy to ungodly men to be kept by severe affliction from "treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath." But if unsurmountable obstructions and inextricable difficulties, not only disable them for a time from finding any pleasure in their sins, or from committing them; but are the means at length of bringing them to themselves, to perceive and lament their folly in departing from God, and to return to him, humbly seeking forgiveness and salvation; the mercy is most eminently precious. When professors of the Gospel depart from the ways of God, and meet with no such thorn-hedges and strong walls to impede their sinful course, and to bring them back ashamed and humbled, their case looks very dark: but if backsliders are by such discipline led to say, 'I will go, and return to the Lord, that I may again have the comfort of communion with him, and of my relation to him; for then it was far better with me than now;' we should encourage and exhort them to decision in so doing. If men forget or consider not, that their comforts come from God, and so they use them in a sinful manner; he will often in mercy take them away, to bring the offenders to reflect on their folly and danger. When he turns unjust stewards out of their stewardship, and calls them to give an account of it, none of their friends or idols can deliver them out of his hand; and all shall see, and be constrained to confess, that they deserve their ignominy and misery.—In this our land of affluence and abundance, what numbers prepare their corn, wine, oil, gold, and silver for Babel, by their excess, luxury, and ostentation! And often the behaviour of those that are employed in gathering in the precious fruits of the earth, seems to be an attempt to revive the bacchanalian riots of ancient idolaters. Men, who live in allowed sin, and then pretend to rejoice in God's ordinances, or on religious festivals; (as many ungodly persons do in their carnal way of celebrating Christmas, &c.) are most awfully deceived: all such rejoicing is vain, and tends to weeping and gnashing of teeth.

V. 14—23.

When sinners seem ripe for vengeance, the Lord sometimes shows his sovereign grace, in having mercy on them. To bring them to repentance, he both drives them from their sins by his terrors and judgments, and allures them by discoveries of his love, and hopes of acceptance and happiness. He often deprives them of all hope and comfort in the world and from themselves; and when their humiliation, terrors, and sorrows tend to desperation, he speaks comfortably to their hearts. He brings them into a desolate wilderness, where no joy can be found, except from his mercy; and thence he gives them all the provisions of his grace, and the comforts and privileges of his salvation. He makes the valley of deep dejection and extreme trouble, to be a door of hope to them; and drives them to despair of earthly joy, and help from themselves; that being shut out from every other door, they may knock at mercy's gate until it be opened. Then their terrors and sorrows are terminated; he brings them out of the horrible pit, and puts a new song into their mouths, and they sing, "O Lord, I will praise thee; though thou wast angry with me, yet thine anger is turned away, and thou comfortest me : behold God is become my Salvation, I will trust, and he will not be afraid." Though the Lord loses none of his authority by his condescending love to us ; yet his awful majesty thus becomes the object of our confidence and delight : and believers are enabled to expect all that tenderness and kindness from their holy God, which a beloved wife can expect from the most affectionate husband, yea, far more. But he saves them from their idols, and sets them against their sins, and disposes them to walk before him in newness of life ; as well as gives them the joy of his favour and salvation. If his new covenant be made with us, he will make all things to work together for our good, and every creature shall help us : for all things are ours, even death itself ; and we may lie down with peace and security in his clay-cold bed, having committed our spirit into the Redeemer's hands. Happy then are they, who are thus betrothed to the Lord, in righteousness, judgment, loving-kindness, mercies, and faithfulness ! though in themselves poor and polluted, weak and foolish ; yet in him they have wisdom, strength, and righteousness, and they are enriched, ennobled, arrayed with garments of salvation, and made most blessed for evermore. Even the vilest of transgressors are now invited to seek, and encouraged to hope for, union with the Lord of life and glory, in this honourable and endeared relation ; nor can too much be expected from his grace, who shed his precious blood for rebels and enemies. Let us then seek an interest in these blessings, compared with which all others are worthless : let us remember, that we are sown in the earth as seed, that in our several places we may conduce to the conversion of our fellow sinners : that they may seek and obtain mercy, who had not obtained mercy ; and that they may say to the Lord, " Thou art my God," who have been strangers and enemies. Let us keep this object in view in all our actions and our whole conversation ; and let us continually pour out our supplications for ourselves and all around us, to God, who will " give grace and glory, and withhold no good thing from those that walk uprightly."

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1-3. Some interpret this, as a vision, or parable which the prophet spake to the people : but they who consider it as a fact, have some hesitation in deciding, whether it related to Hosea's former wife, or to another woman on whom he was to fix his affections. It seems, however, most probable, that it is the continuation and conclusion of the prophet's account of the transaction, with which his prophetic office began ; and which was a picture of the Lord's dealing with Israel. He had married a woman of bad character, and had treated her with affection and kindness ; yet she afterwards became an adulteress and departed from him. She had been beloved of her friend and husband, but proved unfaithful : yet he continued to love her ; and he was directed to go and show his love by his conduct towards her. Instead of a public prosecution or a private divorce, he went with overtures of reconciliation, and only required that she would remain in a state of separation from him for many days, a competent time to evince the sincerity of her repentance ; and that she would no more renew her adulteries, but reserve herself for him ; and then he promised to consider himself as her husband, and at length to take her back to him. The money and the barley, with which he bought her to him, accorded to the customs of those times, when they often gave dowries for, instead of receiving them with, their wives. This implied, that the marriage had been virtually dissolved by her adulteries : and perhaps it served, or was intended, for her maintenance during the days of her seclusion, and to keep her from the temptation of becoming a harlot for subsistence. And the small sum of money, (about l. 7. 6;) and the coarseness of the provisions, being barley, not wheat, might denote the disgraced and abject condition, to which her sin had reduced her ; and might intimate, that she ought to submit to present inconveniences, and wait patiently the time of being restored to favour. We may conclude from the things signified by this transaction, that she submitted to the terms, was received again by the prophet, and behaved better afterwards. For this was " according to the love of the Lord for the children of Israel."—Some interpret this almost wholly of the kingdom of Israel : but the prophecy seems to require us to understand it of the whole people descended from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. They had been espoused to the Lord in the wilderness, notwithstanding their idolatries in Egypt ; and yet, after all the displays of his love to them through their successive generations, they were always prone to fix their eyes on base idols : this was adultery, a violation of their marriage-covenant. They " also loved flagons of wine," they were attached to idol-worship, because in it they gave unbridled license to their sensual appetites. But the Lord still had love for the nation, and though he meant to deprive them of their privileges, exclude them from his Church for many days, and to debase and reduce them to great distress : yet they would still subsist as a distinct people, and at length be anew betrothed to him, and reinstated in his favour and the full enjoyment of their privileges. " The words which our translation renders " flagons of wine," may be translated " cakes made of grapes."—Such were the cakes, probably, which the Jews offered to the queen of heaven. (Jer. vii. 18 xlv. 19.) The expression signifies in general, those entertainments, which they were partakers of, in the idol-temples. (Lowth.)

V. 4, 5. The kingdom of Israel was soon after this entirely ruined, and the people were incorporated, either with the Jews, or the nations among whom they resided; and have had neither king, prince, priest, sacrifice, nor religious establishment, from that day to this. The Jews remained for several years without those advantages, during the Babylonish captivity; yet their civil and religious constitution was again restored. But since the rejection of that nation at the introduction of Christianity, and the destruction of their city and temple by the Romans; they have continued to this time, for much above seventeen hundred years, without king or prince of their own nation; and without priest and sacrifice, or any thing substituted in the place of the temple-worship: and, (what is still more remarkable,) they have also remained without an image, ephod, or teraphim, without any of those idolatrous observances and apparatus, to which they were so generally attached when this prophecy was uttered!—From the time of the destruction of Jerusalem by Vespasian to this day;—they have had no civil government of their own; but live every where as so many exiles, only upon sufferance; they have had neither priests nor sacrifice, their temple being destroyed, where only they were to offer sacrifice. And yet the want of a place, where to perform the most solemn part of their public worship, does not tempt them to idolatry,—which was the epidemical sin of their forefathers.’ (Lynth.)—This is surely a most astonishing prophecy, of events directly contrary to all human probability; yet undeniably taking place, not on a particular occasion, or for a short time, but through very many revolving centuries! How could Hosea have foreseen this, had not God inspired him? And does not this demonstrate, (in the only way by which such things can be demonstrated,) the divine inspiration of this prophecy, and of those by whom it is quoted? (Marg. Ref.) It was also predicted, that afterwards they should return, (from their state of rejection and unbelief,) and seek the Lord their God and David their king.” This even their own writers explain of the promised Messiah, and doubtless it foretold their future conversion to Christ; for which they are evidently preserved a separate people, neither a part of the true Church, nor yet given up to spiritual adultery; but put aside on a separate scanty maintenance, in a debased condition, for a long time, (like Hosea’s wife,) to be at length received to favour again. It is added, “they shall fear the Lord and his goodness:” the discovery which these events shall make of the Lord’s goodness, and of his unmerited kindness and mercy to them in Christ Jesus, will fill them with reverential awe of him and a fear of offending so kind a Friend, and will fix their hearts in the spiritual worship of him and conscientious obedience to his commandments. This would be in the latter days under the Gospel-dispensation, at that approaching period, when they shall be converted to Christ, and gathered from their present dispersions. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When we consider the ingratitude and folly even of believers, their frequent hankerings after, and idolatrous attachment to, worldly objects and sensual gratifications; which is proportionably an unfaithfulness to God and a departure from him: we shall admire his persevering love to them, almost as much as his condescension and compassion to sinners, in the glorious salvation provided for them, and the price with which it was purchased. And as far as consists with other duties, we should copy his example in our readiness to forgive, and be reconciled to those who have most ungratefully and grossly injured us.—The dislike of men to true religion arises from their preference of sensual to spiritual pleasures: they therefore love an object and a form of worship, which allow them to indulge, instead of requiring them to mortify their lusts. But he will cure the objects of his special love of these base propensities; he will rebuke, disgrace, and afflict them for their sins; he will unite his overtures of reconciliation and tokens of love with various humiliating dispensations; he will bring them to repentance, to submit to correction, to separate from sin and worldly idols, and patiently to wait for him; and when they are thus willing to reserve themselves for him alone, he will give himself to them as their God and Portion. The objects of his special love are often left, for a time, in a state of humiliating desertion, without any comfortable communion with him, in order to prove their faith and patience; many of them live a great while in an unconverted state; yet are they restrained from such crimes as would utterly ruin them, or prevent them from filling up their appointed stations in the Church. In due season they are brought to seek the Lord, to trust in the divine Saviour, and to rejoice in his holy comfort. And though their first fear of God arise from a view of his terrible holy majesty, and his righteous and powerful vengeance: yet the discovery of his goodness and his love to sinners through Jesus Christ, and the experience of his mercy and grace, sweetly lead their hearts to a filial reverence of so kind and glorious a friend and Father; to an habitual fear of offending and dishonouring him; a dread of his frown and correcting rod, and an adoring awe of him, when they present their worship and services before him. May we, who live in these latter days, thus fear the Lord and his goodness; and may both Jews and Gentiles thus seek and worship the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

To punish the idolatry and profligacy of the people, he will leave their wives and daughters to commit lewdness, without present punishment, 12—14. NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. Hosea is here supposed by expositors in general, to address the kingdom of Israel exclusively. And perhaps he spake immediately to those of the ten tribes, as living among them; yet his reproofs and exhortations were so framed, as to suit the case of the Jews also when they came into their hands. The former chapters seem to have formed one general subject, consisting of several messages delivered to the people, when at God's command he married Gomer; when her children were born and named; when she departed from him; and when he proposed to her terms of reconciliation. But he here began to speak to them in direct language, concerning their immoralities and idolatries. The children of Israel, or the whole family of Jacob, are called upon to hear the word of God, who had a controversy with all the inhabitants of the promised land; for though he meant first to proceed against Israel, Judah would not escape, without repentance and entire reformation. The ground of this controversy was, "because there was no truth, mercy, or knowledge of God in the land;" there was hardly any sincerity, veracity, or fidelity to be found amongst them; they were dissemblers in religion, and they were deceivers and impostors in their commerce with each other. As there was no honesty among them, it could scarcely be expected there should be any mercy, or compassion and kindness to the poor and afflicted; and in fact they were cruel and selfish extortioners and oppressors of the poor; and they neither knew the character of God, nor his truth or will, so as to be influenced by it, to piety, justice, or charity. But their desperate inward wickedness broke out into multiplied and aggravated perjuries, blasphemies, lies, murders, thefts, and adulteries; the whole body politic was become like one putrid ulcer, or bleeding cancer, or many all running into one. Especially the whole land was full of murders; which were committed in the conspiracies of one usurper against another, in which the adherents of each slaughtered ruler were cut off by the victorious party in great numbers, one company after another. Therefore the most distressing calamities were coming on the land, which would reduce all the inhabitants to the extremest miseries, and end in its total desolation, till neither beasts, fowls, nor fishes were left. These are figurative expressions denoting the entire destruction or dispersion of all the people.

V. 4, 5. "Yet no man contendeth; and no man reproveth." This is a natural rendering, and gives a very usual sense to the Hebrew future. (Bp. Newcombe).—While wickedness of all kinds was openly committed; there was no one either magistrate, or priest, or prophet, who protested against it, or steadily opposed it. According to our version the words imply, that the case was desperate; all were too wicked to be employed as reprovers, or too proud and obstinate to endure reproof. Nay, they were ready to turn against and rend their reprovers, even when authorized by God himself; being of the spirit of Korah and his company, when they strove against Aaron the priest of the Lord; or like Joash king of Judah, who stoned Zechariah the priest, the son of his benefactor Jehoiada, when he reproved him for his sins. (2 Chr. xxiv.) Some object to this interpretation, because it could not be a crime to contend with idolatrous priests: but the conduct of Israel towards the prophets of God, and others who reproved them, might resemble that of such as contended with his priests. They would therefore fall in the approaching day of vengeance, or when they thought themselves most secure; and the ruin of their false prophets would be like that of those who are surprised with calamity in the night, when the terror and distress are more affecting than in the day-time: yea, the Lord would slay the mother, as well as the children; the whole constitution of the Church and nation, as well as individual Israelites, or Samaria the capital of Israel. 'It was a capital offence by the law, for any to behave themselves in a presumptuous manner against the injunctions of the priests.'—(Deut. xvii. 12.) (Louth.) 'If thou faltest in the day, the prophets shall not be long after thee; they shall fall in the night; and I will destroy the very Church and kingdom, whereto thou appertainest.' (Bp. Hall.)

6 ^a My people are ^{*} destroyed ^o for lack of knowledge: ^p because thou hast rejected knowledge, ^q I will also reject thee, that thou shalt be no priest to me: ^r seeing thou hast forgotten the law of thy God, ^s I will also forget thy children.

7 As ^t they were increased, ^u so they sinned against me: ^v therefore will I change their glory into shame.

8 They ^w eat up the sin of my people, and they ^x set their ^y heart on their iniquity.

9 And there shall be, ^z like thy priest; and I will ^{aa} punish them for their ways, and ^{ab} reward them their doings.

10 For ^{ac} they shall eat, and not have enough: ^{ad} they shall commit whoredom, and shall not increase, because they are unwise.

V. 6. The professed worshippers of JEHOVAH were perishing in the most entire ignorance of true religion: this was in great measure the fault of the priests and teachers, who utterly neglected their duty, and indeed were incapable of performing it. The whole company of priests seem to be here addressed as one person; as he had despised and rejected knowledge, and wilfully forgotten the word of God; therefore God would reject him and take no care of his posterity. We cannot suppose that this was exclusively addressed to the priests of the golden calves, and other priests in Israel, whom God had never acknowledged: but it must, in part at least, be spoken of the family of Aaron, whom he had appointed to the priesthood, but would at length reject for their ignorance and wickedness. Some of these might reside in Israel, but most of them were in Judah, which must therefore be here included.

V. 7—11. In proportion as the priests increased in numbers and prosperity, they grew notorious for wickedness: the Lord would therefore render the honour, which had been conferred on them, an occasion of their deeper disgrace; by exposing their crimes and inflicting ignominious punishments upon them. They did not attempt to reform the people, but were well pleased to have the sin-offerings multiplied: for they feasted on the flesh, and had many perquisites from them; and they therefore delighted in the iniquity of the people as increasing their incomes.—Thus absolutions, indulgences, and dispensations have long enriched the Romish clergy; and spiritual courts have prosecuted such offenders, as could afford to pay fines and fees, apparently for no other reason; and many such things have been, and are, perpetrated by the professed ministers of religion! As these priests were the patterns of the people in their crimes, they would be involved with them in punishment, without distinction. At length they would be reduced to pinching famine and unsatisfied hunger; their multiplying of wives and concubines, (contrary to the original law of marriage,) and their other scandalous lewdness, would prevent the increase of their families; and seeing they had left off to take heed to the Lord, manifold evils would come upon them. This shows, that the priests of Aaron's family were chiefly intended: for the priests of the calves, and those of Baal, had not, at any time, taken heed to the Lord. Indeed the whoredom and intemperance both of priests and people deprived them of understanding and judgment, and rendered their hearts and consciences unfeeling, and utterly unfit for any thing good. The people's sins deserved to be punished with such priests; and such priests have helped to make the people thus wicked. (Bp. Hall.)

13 They ⁱ sacrifice upon the tops of the mountains, and burn incense upon the hills, under oaks, and poplars, and elms, because the shadow thereof is good: ^j therefore your daughters shall commit whoredom, and your spouses shall commit adultery.

V. 12—14. The professed worshippers of JEHOVAH were so infatuated by their indulgences and idolatrous practices, that they preferred consulting their wooden images, to inquiring of God by his word, his prophets, or the high priest; and they even divined by means of their staves, in some superstitious manner: being utterly given up to idols, and alienated from God. Because they take away God's honour, and give it to idols: therefore he will give them up to their lusts to dishonour their own bodies. (Rom. i. 23.) They therefore preferred the mountains and groves, where the idols were worshipped, to his temple; because they afforded an agreeable shade and secret recesses, for their abominable impurities. To punish these enormities the Lord determined to leave their daughters and wives to disgrace and to distress them, by committing whoredom and adultery: nor would he inflict on them any immediate judgment for these crimes; which would eventually embolden them to proceed, and others to imitate them, and so to become the scourges of their idolatrous fathers and husbands. And indeed this would be the natural consequence of their crimes: for themselves, (the original is masculine;) though fathers and husbands, separated from their families, to associate with abandoned harlots, even with such as were initiated, or consecrate, to be priestesses of their abominable idols, and prostitutes to their worshippers. Thus they set their wives and daughters an example of the vilest licentiousness, even in religion; and did what they could to corrupt their principles and morals! And a people, that had become thus besotted and infatuated, notwithstanding all their religious advantages, could not long escape destruction. The marginal references show, that many of the same charges were brought by the prophets against Judah, though Israel is here supposed to be principally intended.

V. 15. Here Israel and Judah are separately addressed. The former where wholly given up to idolatry and iniquity: but let not Judah thus offend; they yet have many advantages, and from them the Messiah was to arise. But if the Jews meant to avoid the crimes and ruin of Israel, let them not come near the places where idolatry was practised; Gilgal had been in many instances peculiarly distinguished; but it was become notorious for idolatry. (Marg. Ref.) Beth-aven was the same as Bethel; it had been the house of God, but it was at that time the house of vanity, for so Beth-aven signifies. Neither let them dare to swear by the name of JEHOVAH whilst worshipping their idols, for he abhorred such a coalition: or before the calves, as if they had represented him. ‘God complaineth that Judah is infected, and willet them—to return ^u in time.’

V. 16—19. Israel was become utterly intractable, and obstinate in rebellion; like a refractory heifer, that hangs back and will not draw in the yoke. The Lord therefore intended to disperse them throughout the Assyrian empire, where they would be as much exposed to injury and violence, as a single deserted lamb in a large wilderness to the wild beasts. Ephraim, or the kingdom of Israel, was incurably devoted to idols; and the people should no more be molested by the unwelcome warnings of prophets, or other means of reformation, but be let alone to ripen for destruction. ‘He, (Ephraim,) is gone after their wine.’ ‘He is gone after the wine or banquet of idols.’ (Bp. Newcomb.) Or, he is loathsome through drunkenness. The people were continually given up to whoredom, corporal and spiritual: their rulers were shamefully corrupt, and showed evidently their love of bribes, even demanding them of the people, as the price of deciding in their favour: and therefore they would be hurried into captivity, as by a furious irresistible tempest; and then they would be ashamed of depending on their idolatrous or hypocritical sacrifices.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—11.

The Lord has a controversy with us on account of our sins; and if he contend, either in judgment or in battle, he will overcome. It is therefore our interest as well as duty, to submit and humble ourselves before him. Dreadful is the case of that land, which being favoured with the oracles of God, yet remains devoid of truth, mercy, and piety, and abounds in gross immoralities. We hope this is not absolutely the case with our country: yet we cannot but perceive, that many of these reproofs are too applicable to our national character: our distempered constitution, (as to religion and morality,) breaks out most grievously, by perjuries, profaneness, falsehood, murders, thefts, and shameful adulteries and licentiousness: and the additional prevalence of avowed infidelity and irreligion, renders the nation as one continued leprosy; except as the Lord hath yet reserved to himself a despised remnant of another character. He, however, hath doubtless a controversy with the inhabitants of this favoured land; and what mourning, and desolating judgments he may see good to bring upon us, we cannot tell. Yet there is encouragement for us to protest and strive against sin, and to reprove transgressors: and though many prove refractory and incorrigible, and revile those that speak to them by the authority of God; thus exposing themselves to swift and sudden destruction, with their flattering teachers and the societies to which they belong; yet others are found more teachable. But before we venture to reprove others, it behooves us to inquire, whether the reprovèd persons may not retort on us ‘Physician heal thyself?’ and surely a beam in our own eye will incapacitate us for taking a mote from our brother’s eye: we must not, however, be discouraged by lamented imperfections from so good a work, provided we be not conscious of any allowed wickedness. But, alas, what multitudes, even in this enlightened land, are perishing for lack of the knowledge of God, of his law, his Gospel, and of their own state, interest, and duty!—Ignorance only can be the parent of superstition or enthusiasm; without divine illumination the heart cannot be good, and the ministry of the word is the grand means of that illumination. When the professed teachers of Christianity therefore reject knowledge, and forget the word of God, to pursue other studies, pleasures, or interests, the Lord will reject them, and pour contempt on their families also. The wealth and temporal grandeur of the clergy hath commonly proved an inlet to their increasing iniquity; and their glory in this sense hath proved their shame. At all times this sacred function is a reproach to

From the brink of this precipice may we be kept at the greatest distance! God will abhor the sacrifices and services of those who neglect honesty in their dealings: and when magistrates and rulers love to be bribed to pervert justice, it is not only most shameful and abominable, but it is a grievous symptom of approaching national judgments. And when the wrath of God, like an impetuous tempest shall hurry sinners into everlasting ruin; they will be as much ashamed of their pharisaical or hypocritical services, as of their open impieties and iniquities.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1, 2. These idolatrous priests, and the courtiers and servants of the king of Israel, with himself at the head of them, were warned to expect the speedy approach of the judgment of God against them: because they had bestowed as much pains, and used as much art, to entangle the people in idolatry to their ruin, as the Fowler employed in spreading snares and nets upon the mountains to take the birds. They doubtless used arguments, persuasions, flatteries, menaces, and persecutions, to induce them to conform to the established worship of the golden calves, or of Baal. Some think, that they also set spies to watch that none of the people went up to worship at Jerusalem, in order to ensnare and punish them. These apostates from God's worship were very deep, designing, and crafty, as well as cruel, in promoting the persecution and murder of those who adhered to God, or opposed them: though the Lord, by his prophets and in his providence, frequently and sharply rebuked and chastised them for their crimes.

V. 3, 4. Ephraim, the principal tribe in the kingdom of Israel, is frequently, by a figure of speech, put for the whole. The Lord knew, not only that the Israelites had revolted from him and polluted themselves with idols; but also, that they were so attached to these abominations, and so alienated from him, that they were not at all disposed to “repent and turn to him, and do works meet for repentance.”

him, who is a scandal to it; and his honourable office renders him doubly contemptible. Too many of the clergy regard nothing but the emoluments of their office; they are not grieved at the sins of their people, provided they regularly pay their dues; and the increase of their livings pleases them more than the spiritual good of their flocks. Thus they, as it were, feast on the sins of the people; and leave them unmolested in their evil courses, that they may have less trouble in collecting their dues. For priest and people, being both of the same nature, are liable to commit the same crimes, and incur the same condemnation; except as the same offences are more heinous, and will be more severely punished in the former than in the latter.— Abused wealth tends to poverty, and avarice to disgrace and ruin: and when the clergy leave off to take heed to the Lord, no wonder they are left by him to disgrace themselves by the most scandalous excesses. Sensual lusts stupefy the understanding, harden the heart, and scar the conscience: how then can they who indulge in them, be fitted for the weighty and holy work of the ministry, or indeed for any thing important and useful?

V. 12—19.

They who “like not to retain God in their knowledge,” are often given up to strong delusions, and left to lead others into the same judicial infatuation. Thus they train up their families, by example, influence, and sophistry, in error and impiety, which always tend to vice and immorality. But how can they who are unfaithful to God, expect their wives and children to be faithful to them? Or how can they expect others to maintain their chastity, while notoriously guilty of lewdness in their own conduct? In this way men prepare scourges for themselves, and vice and misery are diffused through whole cities and communities. Let us then watch against all approaches to those abuses, which have gradually led to greater impiety; and keep our religious worship wholly free from all mixture of superstition and sensual indulgence. Whilst sinners obstinately reject the easy yoke of Christ, they are bringing down the heavy load of his vengeance upon themselves; and when they have proceeded to a certain degree of hardness and determination in their crimes; the Lord says

6 They shall go with their flocks and with their herds to seek the Lord; but they shall not find him: he hath withdrawn himself from them.

7 They have dealt treacherously against the Lord; for they have begotten strange children: now shall a month devour them with their portions.

8 Blow ye the cornet in Gibeah, and the trumpet in Ramah; cry aloud at Beth-aven, after thee, O Benjamin.

9 Ephraim shall be desolate in the day of rebuke: among the tribes of Israel have I made known that which shall surely be.

10 The princes of Judah were like them that remove the bound: therefore I will pour out my wrath upon them like water.

11 Ephraim is oppressed and broken down, as he that is oppressed and broken down: he refuseth to be helped.

V. 5. The idolatrous Israelites proudly refused to submit to God, to return to his worship, or to seek forgiveness: they insolently justified themselves, and as it were set him at defiance, by their impenitent rebellion and self-confidence; and this arrogance, which was visible even in their looks, would prove the immediate cause of their ruin: and as Judah also was treading in their steps they would at length fall with them, under the same condemnation. (Note, iv. 15.)

V. 6. This verse is meant of Judah, though they did frequent the temple-worship: yet they came thither without any true sense of religion. God is said to hide or withdraw himself when he will not answer men's prayers, nor afford them reasonable help in time of need. (Lowth. Marg. Ref.)

V. 7. The people married idolaters, and brought up their children as heathens, estranged from God and his worship: this ripened them for destruction; so that a month, or a short and limited time, would destroy both them, and the idols which they had chosen for their portion.

V. 8-10. The prophet called upon the watchmen of Israel and Judah to blow the trumpet of alarm; for the enemy was just at hand: and when the Assyrians had desolated the cities of Israel, even to Bethaven, the principal seat of idolatry, they would fall upon Benjamin also, which belonged to the kingdom of Judah. Ephraim would be totally desolated by the enemy, in the approaching day of rebuke: for the prophet had declared among the tribes of Israel, that only which would surely come to pass. The princes of Judah, by violating God's law, had broken down the fence of his protection; and made way for his wrath to be poured out upon them, as an inundation of waters. When Ahaz, king of Judah, with his princes, called on the kings of Assyria to help him against Syria and Israel, he removed the bound, and opened the way in judgment, because he willingly walked after the commandment.

12 Therefore will I be unto Ephraim as a moil, and to the house of Judah as rottenness.

13 When Ephraim saw his sickness, and Judah saw his wound, then went Ephraim to the Assyrian, and sent to king Jareb: yet could he not heal you, nor cure you of your wound.

14 For I will be unto Ephraim as a lion, and as a young lion to the house of Judah: I, even I, will tear and go away; I will take away, and none shall rescue him.

15 I will go and return to my place, will they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face: in their affliction they will seek me early.

for that inundation, which desolated Israel, and reduced Judah to deep distress. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11, 12. The Israelites suffered exceedingly from the exactions and oppressions of their rulers, and of victorious invaders. This was permitted in order to punish them for their willing and persevering obedience to the laws of Jeroboam and his successors, which required them to worship the golden calves at Dan and Bethel, and to conform to other established idolatries, in express contradiction to the law of God. He would therefore, insensibly, yet assuredly, waste their strength and prosperity, as a moth eats holes in the garment: and as Judah had proved equally submissive to the will of their idolatrous kings; he would consume them, as rottenness and worms do the wood.

V. 13, 14. When Israel and Judah, at different times, found themselves pressed by enemies and dangers; instead of humbling themselves before God and seeking his help, they sought the protection of the Assyrians, and sent to king Jareb, (perhaps another name for Pul, or Tiglath-pilezer); but instead of healing their wounds, or doing them any service, they helped to make them incurable. (Marg. Ref.) This obstinacy provoked the Lord to become their open enemy, and to destroy them, as a fierce young lion would tear and carry away the helpless cattle; whilst none of their idols or allies could rescue them from his hands. Jareb signifies He shall plead. The king of Assyria perhaps undertook to be arbitrator between Judah and Israel, and to mediate a peace.

V. 15. The mercy-seat was properly the Lord's place among his people; which he left when he came forth to execute vengeance upon them: but having done this, he meant to return to his place, and there to wait and to leave them under their punishment, till they should repent, or plead guilty, and confess their sins, and seek his favour

COME, and let us return unto the LORD: for he hath torn, and he will heal us; he hath smitten, and he will bind us up.

2 After two days will he revive us: in the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight.

3 Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the LORD: his going forth is prepared as the morning; and he shall come unto us as the rain, as the latter and former rain unto the earth.

and protection. And he knew that, however they had despised him, in their affliction they would feel their need of him, and seek him without delay or remissness.—(Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All ranks of men must stand before God in judgment; and all ought to yield an obedient ear to his word, and to the warnings of his ministers to "flee from the wrath to come;" for as all have sinned, all should repent, and humbly seek his pardoning mercy. None are exposed to severer punishment, than they who artfully entice men to sin and ensnare them in fatal errors; and kings and priests have often been peculiarly guilty of this great transgression. They who apostatise from God and his truth, commonly become the bitterest enemies to such as adhere to him: they have often employed most profound dissimulation and diabolical malice, to make slaughter of them, as enemies to the Church and state; and rebukes and corrections have seldom deterred them from persecuting projects. The Lord perfectly knows men, and none of their designs or motives are concealed from him; though they deeply disguise them from others, and even from themselves, and cover their grossest defilements with specious pretensions. Our doings must be carefully framed to return to the Lord, if we would be at peace with him: for he delighteth not in a vain profession, and empty forms or notions; but he requires that our repentance and faith be manifested in our whole temper and conduct. But they who know not the Lord, nor "the power of his anger," the value of his favour, and the efficacy of his converting grace; remain under the influence of that "spirit which worketh in the children of disobedience; and will never frame their doings to return to God." Pride makes men obstinate in other sins, and rivets the chains which sensual or worldly lusts have forged: for "the wicked through the pride of their countenance will not seek after God," or submit to him in sincere repentance; and therefore, having fallen into, they must perish in, iniquity. With such unhumbléd, unbelieving, and rebellious hearts, men may go with their flocks and herds, and the most expensive and ostentatious services, to seek the Lord: but they will not find him; for he withdraws himself from proud pharisees and hypocrites to commune with broken-hearted publicans and sinners.—By dealing treacherously with the Lord men only deceive themselves. The educating of children, as strangers to God and his truth, exceedingly hastens the doom of guilty nations: when tokens of approaching ruin appear, ministers ought to give the alarm before evil overtake the criminals; and when some are cut off in the day of the Lord's rebuke, they must warn others to expect the same punishment unless they repent. Such things will be generally among the tribes of Israel; and the watchman must give warning, if he mean to deliver his own soul. When princes break down the fence of the divine law, by their edicts, decisions, or examples, they open the flood-gates of God's wrath: and when subjects willingly obey ungodly and persecuting statutes, they may expect to be given up to grievous oppressions and exactions; for God will disregard the interest, liberty, and security of those who disregard his honour and renounce his service. His more ordinary judgments insensibly waste men's prosperity and comfort; but when under rebukes they trust to an arm of flesh, and have recourse to sinful expedients, they will not only find that they cannot bring cure or deliverance, but that God will visit them with more terrible displays of his indignation. Yet he will return to his place, his mercy-seat, and wait there to be gracious to all who acknowledge their offences and seek his face. Many, indeed, who despise him in their prosperity, appear to seek him under their afflictions: but he knows how to distinguish the upright from the hypocrite; and they who are first led by severe tribulations to seek him earnestly, diligently, and sincerely, will find him a present Help and an effectual Refuge; as with him is mercy and plenteous redemption, for all those who call upon him in truth.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—3. The prophet took occasion from the intimation of mercy at the close of the former chapter, to exhort the people, without delay to come together, and with one accord to return to the worship of the Lord. As this referred to the events predicted in the former chapter; that is, to the desolations that were coming on the people, by the Assyrians and Chaldeans; the exhortation may be considered as the language of the penitents to each other and to their neighbours, calling on them to unite in humiliation, repentance, and works meet for repentance. They considered their miseries as the effect of God's righteous indignation. He had torn and smitten them, and their enemies were his instruments; and from his mercy, truth, and power alone, they hoped for deliverance; he alone could, and they trusted he would, heal their distempers and bind up their wounds. Instead therefore of fleeing from him as an enemy, they encouraged each other to apply to him as their Physician. Rev

... time they would have to wait for his interposition; the nation of Israel was as it were dead, but after two days, that is, on the third day, the Lord would revive them, and they would live in his sight, as his people, upon their return from the Babylonish captivity, after the appointed time of its continuance. The language is generally supposed to be prophetic of the resurrection of Christ on the third day, with whom as her Surety the whole Church virtually arose from the dead, to live unto God; with him the hopes of all believers revived; his power, as risen, quickens their souls when dead in sin; and his resurrection was the earnest of the resurrection of their bodies unto everlasting life. In the persevering exercise of faith, and by waiting on the Lord, in every means of becoming acquainted with him and his perfections, truth, and will, they would obtain an experimental knowledge of his mercy and faithfulness, and a comforting knowledge of their own pardon and acceptance. For "his going forth was prepared as the morning;" the time that intervened between the promise of a Saviour to fallen man, unto his coming, and exaltation at the right hand of the Father, resembled that which intervenes between the dawning of the day, and the meridian brightness of the sun; and he would as surely come and effect the redemption of his Church, as sun-rising follows the dawn. His coming likewise to save and comfort every penitent, would be gradual and certain, from his first sense of his guilt to the completion of his salvation in heavenly felicity. (Note, Pror. iv. 13, 19.) In neither sense, doth his going forth resemble a meteor, or the evening sun; but the increasing brightness of the morning from the first dawn, which can scarcely be discerned, or distinguished from other appearances, to the noon-day brightness. The Lord would also descend upon the souls of those who waited on him, as the former and latter rain upon the earth; purifying, softening, fructifying, and refreshing them, by the influences of his Holy Spirit.

V. 4, 5. Neither Ephraim nor Judah would thus wait for and on the Lord; and he spake as one that was at a loss what to do with them. He was not willing wholly to give them up; yet he did not deem it honourable to save them from ruin in their present state of mind, and all means used to reform them had proved ineffectual. Whilst they were smarting under the rod or filled with terror; or when their reforming kings were exerting their pious endeavours, or the prophets were labouring among them; they seemed favourably disposed to repent and return to the Lord: but this their goodness, (unlike the morning light, or the sated rain,) vanished like the empty morning-

cloud and the early dew, and produced no abiding effect on their conduct; and when the causes of these transient impressions ceased, they relapsed into idolatry and iniquity, and were as vile as ever. In the night of adversity, they seemed religious; but the rising sun of returning prosperity dispersed all these promising appearances. Therefore it was, that the Lord sent them such awful messages by the prophets, as were suited either to hew them into shape or to hew them in pieces; nay, "he slew them by the words of his mouth," which were like pronouncing the sentence of death on a criminal, and giving orders for his execution; and the judgments, that were denounced against them were gradually and certainly approaching, as the light from the dawning of the day, instead of that favour which was arising upon true penitents: nay, the justice of God would be as clear as the morning light.

V. 6. All the appointed sacrifices were typical of Christ's atonement, external signs of the offerer's faith and repentance, acts of worship towards God, and means of grace to believers. But the people deemed them the substantial part of religion; presented them in unbelief, pride, and impotence; and thought to compensate by them for their entire neglect of justice, mercy, and piety, and for all their scandalous crimes: and when they omitted these institutions, they thought the Lord's controversy with them was chiefly on that account. He therefore informed them, that he "desired mercy and not sacrifice," or rather than sacrifice; and the knowledge of him, which produced holy fear, dependence, submission, obedience, and love, more than burnt-offerings; because they were of superior excellence and immutable obligation. He was displeased with them for their injustice, oppression of the poor, idolatry, and impiety: and no number of sacrifices could avail them, whilst they continued in sin. This no way interferes with the great doctrine, of the sacrifice of Christ being the sole meritorious cause of a sinner's pardon and acceptance with God; or with that of faith alone interesting us in his atonement: or with the necessity of our attendance on instituted ordinances. But it exposes the folly of such as trust in external observances of any kind, to compensate for their want of love to God and man: it shows, that nothing can profit which does not spring from repentance and faith, and is not attended with a sober, righteous, and godly life; and that externals may safely be omitted or postponed, when the exercise of mercy and kindness to our brethren requires it. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8, 9. Ramoth-gilead, beyond Jordan, was one of the cities of refuge, and allotted to the priests; but it was totally given up to wickedness and polluted with murder. (Marg. Ref.) The company of priests also, that dwell there, was a mere banditti; consenting together in robbery, murder, and every enormity; standing by each other in doing, and vindicating their evil deeds. (Marg.) — The Hebrew word Aven, translated iniquity, frequently signifies idolatry; and the blood which Gilead is said to have been polluted with, may mean the blood of their children which they sacrificed to Moloch. Dr. Wells interprets it, of those Gileadites who assisted Pekah in the murder of Pekahiah, (2 Kings xv. 25.) The phrase translated here, "polluted with blood," literally signifies with bloody footsteps, being taken from such as are found with their shoes stained with the blood they have shed. (1 Kings ii. 5.) (Lenth.) The word rendered "by consent," seems to mean towards Shechem. The priests beset the road to Shechem, as robbers and murderers.

V. 10. An horrible thing. "Such an apostasy from God, as cannot be mentioned without horror." (Lenth.) — The idolatry begun by Jeroboam, of the tribe of Ephraim, had opened the way for all the subsequent abominations, by which the kingdom of Israel was polluted. "He made Israel to sin."

V. 11. The seeds of idolatry, from Israel, had been sown plenteously in Judah; and thus he, (that is Israel, or Ephraim,) had prepared a harvest for Judah also. The nation was become ripe for divine judgments, which would be inflicted by the Assyrians and Chaldeans; until the time when God would "turn away the captivity of his people." (Ps. xiv. 7. liii. 6. cxvii. 1.) "When I would have "turned away the captivity of my people;" "When I would, upon their repentance, have averted my judgments, which will end in their captivity." (Lenth.) — "Among those who lead away the captivity of my people." (Bp. Newcombe.) This translation requires only a trivial change of the pointing.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In all our troubles we should place our whole confidence in the Lord's mercy; and should take warning and encouragement to return to him, and exhort others to do the same. He afflicts us in providence, that we may look to him to restore our prosperity: he convinces and humbles our hearts by his Holy Spirit, and often fills the conscience with remorse and dismay, in order to prepare us for the healing balm of his salvation, and the consolations which he bestows on the contrite believer. No affliction or temptation therefore, no guilt or power of sin, no wounded spirit or terrified conscience, should induce us to despair of help and comfort from God. He may suffer us for a time to be seized on with "the sorrows of death or the pains of hell," and to be "like those that go down into the pit;" but as he raised the Redeemer from the grave; so will he revive the hearts and hopes of all that trust in him, and cause them at length to walk before him, and to rejoice in his manifested presence and love. Let us then begin and "follow on to know the Lord;" that we may experience the freeness and efficacy of his grace, the faithfulness of his promises, and the felicity of his people. The feeblest glimpse of hope in his word, which dawns upon the humbled sin-distressed soul, is a sure earnest of increasing light and comfort, till "the Sun of righteousness shall arise upon him with healing in his wings;" and till he shall arrive in the presence above, and possess the fullness of knowledge, purity, love, and joy for evermore. Increasing light and hope shall be afforded to the waiting soul, with showers of purifying, fertilizing, and comforting grace; and he, who sent the former, will send the latter rain also, and perfect the good work that he hath begun. But we have not the same reason to depend on our own resolutions, convictions, or hopeful beginnings, as we have to trust in the truth and mercy of our God: alas! these are as mutable, as the others are unchangeable. Under the rod of affliction, under terrors of conscience, or under the awakening word of some Boanerges, many seem deeply impressed and well disposed to religion: but when the restraint, the scourge, the terror is removed, their transient goodness vanishes like an empty cloud, or is exhaled by temptation as the dew by the burning sun; and we mourn our disappointed expectations respecting them. What shall be done with such persons? For "if any man draw back, the Lord will have no pleasure in him." Or what shall he do to us, who are prone to a similar, if not an equal, inconstancy? May he put his fear into our hearts, and set up his kingdom within us, and never, never more, leave us to ourselves, or suffer us to be overcome by temptation! Obstinate transgressors must not expect soothing messages from a holy God: he will "hew them by the words of his prophets;" and if this do not prevail to bring down to the dust of self-abasement, "he will slay them by the words of his mouth" and, by executing his threatened vengeance on them, convince them of the truth of his holy word. All oblations and external services are mere pride and hypocrisy; whilst justice, mercy, truth, and piety are neglected: and that confidence even in the sacrifice of Christ is mere presumption, which encourages any one to continue in sin. If men had the true knowledge of God, they could not be so deluded; and if they were partakers of true faith, they could not but hate sin, and uprightly fear, love, obey, and serve the Lord. But under every dispensation men prove themselves the children of Adam, by breaking the law, and abusing the mercy and goodness of God: the most favoured places become most notorious for sin; the most sacred offices are often filled by the vilest of men; no tongue can express what horrible defilements God sees continually even in his visible Church. But whilst multitudes are ripening for destruction, a time is coming, when he will return the captivity of his people, and fill the earth with his glory: and then Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall abound in songs of grateful praise.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1-3. The labours of Elijah, Elisha, and many other prophets; the ruin of Ahab's idolatrous family by Jehu, who destroyed Baal out of Israel; and all that succession of mercies and warnings, which the Lord continued to them, were means used for their healing; but they eventually served the more to discover the extreme wickedness of all ranks of men; especially in Samaria, where fraud, violence, and robbery were perpetrated in the most atrocious manner. For they never seriously considered that God noted and remembered against them, all their wickedness; not even when the effects of their crimes beset them about, and caused them manifold distresses. But as their kings and princes were given up to idolatry and other wickedness, the people were glad to oblige them, by conforming to their false worship, copying their vices, and lavishing flattering encomiums, upon them; with which they were highly gratified, and rendered bolder in wickedness. The succession of kings from Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, to the prophet's time, may be intended.

V. 4. The whole company were adulterers as well as idolaters, and were most eagerly bent upon the indulgence of their unlawful lusts. Their hearts were inflamed with sensual desires like a heated oven. Satan or his agents had kindled this fire: and they cherished and kept it burning; waiting for the opportunity of gratifying it without regard to duty or decency. The tempter had only to prepare them the occasion of sin, as the baker prepares the dough for the heated oven; and they were ready to seize upon it. (Marg.) "He will cease from waking, after, &c." Marg. The baker may take his rest, till the dough be ready. (6, 7.)

V. 5-7. On the king's birth-day, or coronation-day, or some other public occasion when he made a royal feast, his nobles tempted him to drink to the most shameful excess, "making him sick with bottles of wine;" (or the heat of wine: and when he was thus intoxicated, "he stretched out his hand with scorners;" treated every thing sacred with the most impious contempt, and perhaps employed his authority to persecute the worshippers of JEHOVAH. 'Some recent and notorious act of contempt' to God, or to his prophets, or to public justice, is here alluded to.' (Bp. Newcomb.) Thus they prepared themselves and each other for every daring wickedness; and perhaps some of them had their hearts inflamed with ambition and revenge, and lay in wait for that opportunity to murder the drunken king and usurp his throne. Their furious passions rendered Satan's temptations unnecessary. Their baker might sleep all the night, and in the morning find his oven as hot as he could wish it, that is their hearts as ready for any wickedness as could be desired. For, being heated with wine and sinful passions, they murdered their magistrates and kings one after another: yet neither the people nor any one of their kings, amid these distractions and miseries, would seek help from God! (Notes, 2 Kings xv. xvi.)

gray hairs are here and there upon him, yet he knoweth not.

10 And the pride of Israel testified to his face: and they do not return to the Lord their God, nor seek him for all this.

11 ¶ Ephraim also is like a silly dove without heart: they call to Egypt, they go to Assyria.

12 When they shall go, I will spread my net upon them; I will bring them down as the fowls of the heaven; I will chastise them, as their congregation hath heard.

13 Woe unto them! for they have their backs fled from me: † destruction unto them!

V. 8-10. Ephraim, (or the kingdom of the ten tribes,) had intimately connected himself with the surrounding nations, by alliances, intermarriages, and communion in idolatry: yet he still pretended to worship JERUHOVAH. Thus he became a cake not turned, half burnt and half dough, and none of it fit for use: a motly mixture of idolatry and the worship of God. But he was eager in iniquity, and lukewarm in religion, and partial in every attempt to reform. The strange gods and heathen alliances weakened him continually; and the neighbouring nations by hostile invasions devoured his strength: yet he perceived no danger, and never suspected the cause of his decay, namely, that the hand of God was lifted up against him. (Marg. Ref.) In short, he had as evident tokens of approaching ruin, as gray hairs are of old age and of the decay of the constitution: and the prophets evidently saw these symptoms, and pointed them out to him, but he took no notice. This arose from his pride, which openly testified against him; seeing neither judgments, warnings, nor mercies could induce him to return and seek the Lord.

V. 11, 12. In another view of the subject, the conduct of Ephraim might be likened to that of a dove; Ephraim was become like a silly dove; not in innocence and gentleness, but in folly and timorousness, having neither understanding, courage, nor resolution. He was frightened at every appearance of danger: but instead of fleeing to the Lord for refuge, as the doves fly to their windows; he was like the silly dove, that flieth here and there for safety till she is taken in the fowler's net. Sometimes he applied to the Assyrians, and sometimes to the Egyptians, without prudence, or prospect of safety: and thus he would be entangled in the net which the Lord had spread for him; and be overtaken with inevitable ruin, as the fowls are ensnared and destroyed by the fowler. For God would certainly punish them, as the congregation of Israel had repeatedly heard from the prophets; and especially, as had been foretold in the books of Moses. (Marg. Ref.) "When they hearken to their assembly," When they are swayed by the counsel of their assembly to seek foreign assistance.' Br. Newcomb.)

V. 13-16. Deserved ruin must come upon the people, seeing they had not only transgressed against God, but fled from him, who alone could pardon and save them. Though he had often redeemed them from their enemies; yet they had spoken lies against him, as if he were a severe master, and his service hard and unprofitable; or they had mocked him with hypocritical professions of repentance. Even when, on the bed of sickness or death, or labouring under heavy afflictions, they howled out for anguish and terror, and vented their bitter and impatient complaints before God; they did not cry to him with their hearts; they did not humble themselves before him or expect help from him; at least they did not intend to return to his service, but only cried out, (like the unclean spirit,) "Torment me not," in a mixture of horror and cmity. When they met together to pray for a favourable harvest or vintage, they only sought these things to consume on their lusts, and persisted at the very time in rebellion against God. (James iv. 1-3.) And when the Lord chastised them, and afterwards bound up their wounds and strengthened them, they still devised more rebellion and wickedness against him. Even when they seemed to repent and turn to him, they only left Baal to worship the golden calves; or they rested in some form of external reformation, and never came up to true repentance, faith, spiritual worship, or holy obedience. They deceived every expectation formed of them, like a broken or an useless bow in the day of battle: their princes therefore would one after another perish by the sword, for their daring impieties and revilings of God's prophets: and their miseries would excite the derision of the Egyptians, on whom they had depended for protection against the Assyrians. (Marg. Ref.)

providential dispensations, only serve to detect and aggravate their wickedness; except they be accompanied with his special blessing. The whole salvation of the righteous is therefore of the Lord; but the condemnation of the wicked is of themselves, and justly deserved. Men commit numerous and heinous crimes, without reflection, recollection, or remorse: because they consider not that the Lord remembers all their wickedness, and will produce the whole of it as evidence against them, and show all the world the justice of their punishment by discovering the malignity of their crimes. Alas, how poor an object do men attain, who ingratiate themselves with ungodly kings and nobles, by wickedness and lies; and thus expose themselves to the wrath of God, and even increase the condemnation of their wicked patrons! The depraved hearts of men and the temptations of Satan are as congenial as fire and fuel, and concur in preparing sinners for the practice of every crime: and want of opportunity, ability, or courage prevents more wickedness, than perhaps all other causes combined. So that the open, and even the secret, enormities of men's lives, atrocious as they are, bear a very small proportion to the desperate wickedness of their hearts. But when lust is inwardly conceived and cherished, it will more or less break forth into outward sin: he, who first suggests the idea of forbidden indulgence, will assist in devising the means of gratification; and then sinners will proceed without further temptation, "having made ready their hearts like an oven," whilst they lie in wait for the opportunity. Thus adulteries, murders, and all horrible crimes are perpetrated, without hesitation or remorse, when they can be done with present impunity. Days of public festivity are commonly attended with much wickedness, and followed with many fatal effects. Intoxication leads men to every kind of impiety and immorality: but what an infamy is it for a king to be made sick with bottles of wine, and to be a companion and an example to scorners and blasphemers! They who tempt rulers to such a degrading vice, can never be their friends: and not unfrequently the event shows that they were plotting their ruin; and that they were lying in wait, with hearts full of malice or ambition, to murder both body and soul, by an exquisite refinement in cruelty. Whilst men thus execute the vengeance of God on each other, how seldom do those that witness such transactions, call upon God, who alone can preserve them from being involved in similar ruin! Thus nations ripen for destruction: and such as are called Christians, often differ in nothing from pagans, except in the worthless attempt to form a coalition between religion and the world; that is between God and the devil! But we are so blind to ourselves, that neither nations, churches, nor individuals can see, in their own case, those symptoms of decay and approaching ruin, which are visible to all around them!

The same pride, that emboldens men to break the law of God, leads them to self-lattery, and to continue impenitent amidst the rebukes of providence, and the warnings of his word. "They will not return to the LORD, nor seek him for all this."

V. 11—16.

When sinners are terrified, and driven from one scheme to another for safety; they are so devoid of understanding, that the mercy and grace of God are frequently the only refuge to which they never think of fleeing! But whatever other expedients they have recourse to, the Lord will take them in his net, and execute upon them those judgments, of which all his congregations have heard. Wo then be to those transgressors, who attempt to flee from God! for in this way destruction is inevitable. But to him, as the Redeemer of Israel, the chief of sinners may approach with acceptance; and they who perish in their sins, speak lies against him, if they charge their ruin either on his secret purposes, or his refusal to have mercy on them. Yet numbers, when in deep distress they howl forth their terrors in the form of prayers, do not cry to God with their hearts, for the blessings of his complete salvation. Even their prayers for temporal mercies only require provision for their lusts, and are united with rebellion. Whether God afflict and weaken, or bind up and strengthen them, they continue to devise mischief against him. Their very repentance, and conversion from one sect, sentiment, form, or vice to another, leave them far short of conversion to Christ and holiness: for "they return, but not to the most High," and rest in some plausible scheme of hypocrisy or false religion. When they speak fair, their professions are deceitful; but when they vent outrageous blasphemies and lies, their tongues agree with their hearts: and their destruction will be attended with the derision and contempt of their tempters and companions in iniquity. Such is human nature! Such is the progress and end of impiety! Such shall we prove if left to ourselves! "Create in us a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within us."

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1. The prophet, as Israel's watchman, was commanded to blow the trumpet, and give warning of the coming of the Assyrian king with speed and violence, like an eagle, against the people among whom God had dwelt; because they had now provoked him by violating his covenant to depart from them. Give notice of the approaching enemy, (v. 8.) who is coming with speed and fierceness, like a bird of prey against the city and temple of Jerusalem. (Marg. Ref.) By "the house of the LORD," may be meant God's people in general, whom he formerly took care of, as his own family, (ix. 15.) This may probably denote Sennacherib's invasion. (Louth.)—This verse may be considered as a general warning to Judah as well as Israel: though the following verses are immediately addressed to the ten tribes.

 8 Israel is swallowed up: now shall they be among the Gentiles as a vessel wherein is no pleasure.
 9 For they are gone up to Assyria, a wild ass alone by himself: Ephraim hath hired lovers.

V. 2—4. When Israel should be hard pressed by the Assyrians, they would claim a relation to God, and profess to put themselves under his protection, as a people that had known and worshipped him. But their pretensions would be disregarded; for they had cast off him that is good, or that which is good; they had forsaken the Lord, and his temple and worship: they had despised his prophets and trampled on his law, by their idolatries and iniquities, and this for many ages: therefore their enemies would pursue and prevail against them. They had set up kings and princes of their own choosing, in opposition to his chosen race the family of David, when they revolted from Rehoboam, and through all succeeding generations: they never consulted their heavenly King, about the appointment of their earthly kings: and both they and their kings and princes, had employed their treasures in making idols, as if on purpose to provoke God to cut them off.

V. 5, 6. The calf of Samaria, (or that placed at Bethel, in the kingdom of which Samaria was the capital,) could not protect its worshippers: but would cast them off, when they were left in the hands of the Assyrians, who seized upon their idol also. "Remove far from thee thy calf, O Samaria." (Bp. Newcombe.) And how long would it be ere they cleared themselves of this idolatry: Did they never intend it? The whole of that worship was Israel's invention, from the time when the golden calf was made in the wilderness, contrary to the express command of God. The workmen made the idol, and it could neither be God, nor any proper representation of him; but a mere dead image of a calf, that would soon be broken to pieces.

V. 7, 8. All the expense and trouble of the people in their worship, and all their crimes, politics, and heathen alliances, by which they attempted to secure themselves, were only sowing the wind; and if they had any increase, they could only reap the whirlwind. Such seed could produce nothing valuable: and if a little transient prosperity seemed to result from it, it would soon be torn from them by strangers, who would swallow them up with their property; and they would be left among the nations, as a broken or mean vessel, which a man throws away, or uses for the basest purposes.

V. 9, 10. When the Syrians attacked the Israelites, they applied for help to the kings of Assyria; and they ran about as a headstrong wild ass when separated from his companions. At a vast expense they hired the assistance of idolaters, and conformed to their mode of worship. But though they seemed to have obtained their purpose, and to have engaged powerful allies; yet the Lord would gather them together against them as their enemies; and would begin to punish them by the burden or tribute laid on them by the king of Assyria, who called himself a king of princes. Yet this would be a light affliction, compared with those that would follow. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11, 12. The Israelites, having, in the days of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, forsaken the temple and altar at Jerusalem, erected altars at Bethel and Dan, and at several other places, both to the golden calves and to Baal, &c.; as if they had purposely intended to add sin to sin: therefore their altars and sacrifices would be imputed to them as aggravated crimes, and expose them to just and dreadful punishment. The Lord had caused the great and important truths and requirements of his law, respecting himself and the worship and service which he required, to be written for their instruction, and he had sent his prophets to enforce it upon the people; but they continued to treat it as a strange thing; they knew scarcely any thing of it, they disregarded and despised it, and adhered to their own devices. as other nations, which had not forsaken God, in so aggravated a manner, or been guilty of such deep contempt or so base and ungrateful an apostasy, as they had. Their prosperity therefore would be more transient and ruinous, than that of other nations; for like an adulterous woman, they had violated their covenant with God, and preferred the most worthless idols to him. They loved even to receive the fruits of the earth, as from these their paramours; as festivals in honour of their idols were more suited to their state of heart, than presenting the sacrifices of thanksgiving to God, and honouring him with their substance, (ii. 12.) He therefore would visit them with famine; so that their corn-floor and wine-press would not suffice for their support, instead of supplying their luxurious revels; and the new wine would lie to "her," by disappointing her expectations, that is, those of the nation, considered as a harlot. Nay, the people would not be allowed to inhabit the Lord's favoured and good land, where he deigned to dwell among his worshippers: some of them would migrate into Egypt, either in the time of famine or when pressed by the Assyrians: the rest would be carried into Assyria, and there be constrained to live on food that was ceremoniously unclean, or even refuse and vile, being pressed with extreme necessity.

V. 4-6. The Israelites would have no opportunity of pouring out wine-offerings to the Lord, nor any wine to do it with; neither could they present any acceptable service, or have any communion with him, (as the word may signify.) Their sacrifices would be either totally interrupted, or would be as the bread of mourners; who being unclean could not eat of the holy things without violating the law. (Marg. Ref.) The shew-bread would no longer be presented in the house of the Lord in their behalf; nor sacrifices offered for them. And what would they do, on their solemn feasts, when both the spiritual and carnal joy of them had ceased? For the prophet, as it were, beheld and saw the people gone out of the land, to avoid impending destruction; and they would be collected together into

Egypt, to die and be buried there: whilst their pleasant places, which were decorated or filled with silver, (as well as their other more humble tabernacles,) would soon be overgrown with nettles and thorns.

V. 7, 8. The prophets had long foretold these days of visitation and retribution, and Israel would soon know the truth of their predictions; though they now counted the prophet a fool, and the inspired servant of God a madman, because of their extreme depravity, and enmity to the Lord and his cause. Or the event would show their false prophets and pretenders to inspiration to have been fools and madmen, to whose delusions God had given up Israel, to punish the multitude of their crimes and their great hatred of him. The prophet observed that the watchmen of Ephraim, (as Elijah, Elisha, Miraiab, &c.) had communed with his God, had him with them in their work, and wrought with him in turning many to righteousness: but these nominal watchmen, or prophets, were in all their ways like the snare of a fowler, to entangle men to their ruin; as they increased the people's hatred of God and his worship, and thus brought down vengeance upon themselves and them, by their idolatry or hypocrisy. The marginal reading, "hated against the house of his God," gives the clearer sense. Some give another turn to the verse, 'Ye falsely imagined that these prophets of Ephraim were sent of God, and had familiar acquaintance with him: but ye shall find them to be but as the snare of a fowler.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 9, 10. (Notes, Judg. xix-xxi.) The people of all the tribes of Israel were become as deeply corrupted as the men of Gibeah, who abused and murdered the Levite's concubine; or those of the tribe of Benjamin, who defended the perpetrators of that detestable crime, and so were almost wholly cut off; and in like manner God would remember and visit the crimes of the generation, to whom the prophet spake. Indeed Israel in his first and best days, just before his entrance into Canaan, we are pleasing to God, as grapes would be to a weary traveller in the parched desert; or as the first ripe figs, when being scarce they are the more valued; yet even when the nation thus followed the Lord in the wilderness, a multitude of them were seduced by the Midianitish women, to frequent the temple of Baal-peor, and to separate themselves from God's ordinances unto that shameful idolatry, and that abominable whoredom, which they loved better than the spiritual and holy worship of JEHOVAH. The Hebrew word genazzaru, were segregated, alludes to the order of the Nazarites, who were in a peculiar manner set apart for God's service. Whereas these dedicated themselves to the service of that filthy idol Baal-peor, — Besheth, shame, was a nickname for Baal, so Jerub-baal is called 'Jerub-besheth.' (2 Sam. xi. 21.) (Note, Judg. vi. 31, 32.)

V. 11—14. Ephraim signifies fruitfulness: and the vast number to which this tribe had increased, was its peculiar glory. (Marg. Ref.) By this distinction, the Ephraimites seem to have been greedily elated, but it was about to fly away, speedily and irrecoverably, as a bird let loose. Their children would die as soon as they were born, or be still-born or abortions; by which the nation would be gradually enfeebled and diminished: and of the small number, that should grow up to maturity, the Lord would so bereave them by various judgments, that there should be scarcely any left of them: for nothing but misery could ensue, when God had been provoked to depart from them in anger, and to deprive them of his gracious presence and protection. Indeed Ephraim had been as prosperous and replenished, and as pleasantly situated, as even the flourishing city of Tyre, which excited the admiration of all beholders: but from this time they would bring forth and educate children, merely to be butchered by their enemies. So that the prophet scarcely knew what to ask in their behalf; or could only entreat the Lord to give them "a miscarrying womb and dry breasts," as a less calamity than bringing forth children for the murderer, or to be trained up in idolatry. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15—17. Gilgal, where their fathers first covenanted with God, after they had entered the promised land, and where his tabernacle once stood before it was removed to Shiloh, (Josh. v. 9, 10, x. 41,) was at the time when the prophet wrote, become the repository or all kinds of idolatry and iniquity, whence they were diffused through the land on each side of Jordan: therefore the Lord abhorred them, and resolved to drive them out of his house, as an adulteress woman when divorced. (Note, iv. 15.) Nor would he any more love them, or specially favour them; seeing all their princes were revolvers, rebels, and apostates. Indeed the calamities were begun: their root was dried up, and their fruit would wither. When the Israelites were sentenced to fall in the wilderness, their children were preserved to inherit the promised land: but as Ephraim was to be finally rejected, even the beloved fruit of the womb would be slain with their parents, as those of the Canaanites had been. God had determined to cast them off, because they would not hearken to him: and the remnant of them would be scattered as wanderers among the nations. This was soon after fulfilled, respecting the kingdom of the ten tribes, and continues so to this day: and even such of them as were incorporated with the Jews, have with them been wanderers among the nations for many hundred years. (Notes, v. Marg. Ref.) It is wonderful, that these prophecies, so often repeated, and so exactly descriptive of the present state of that favoured nation, after many revolving ages, do not more impress the minds of those who read them, with admiration of the foreknowledge of God, and full conviction of the divine inspiration of the holy Scriptures.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

They who abide under the wrath of God, and continue to accumulate guilt and condemnation, can have no good cause to rejoice in temporal prosperity: but such as apostatize from the religion of pious ancestors, violate their own solemn engagements, and run into wickedness in opposition to the convictions of their consciences, and the strivings of God's Spirit with them, have less reason for joy than any other sinners; for to them belongs the deepest condemnation. Abundance received as the reward of serving Mammon, or abused in making provision for men's lusts, will end either in most ruinous prosperity, or most distressing calamities. They whose pampered bodies are rendered unclean by their unlawful indulgences, may perhaps be reduced to the necessity of eating the most unclean and unwholesome food, through the extremity of indigence. But no famine is so dreadful as that of the soul: awful is the case of those who can perform no acceptable service to the Lord, but must either utterly neglect him, or render him such worship as he abhors: yet in this case we should all have been, had not the Son of God, by his incarnation, atonement, and intercession, opened us a door of access and acceptance through faith in his name. Men may now despise the solemn days and ordinances of God, and disdain every feast that cannot gratify their sensuality. But the utter want of every means of grace and hope of mercy, will make them know their value; and what will they then do? Thus multitudes hurry on to destruction: their bodies are gathered into the grave; their souls sink into hopeless misery; and their pleasant places for their silver, as well as their commodious habitations, (if not covered with thorns and nettles,) yet pass into the hands of those who neither know nor care what is become of them. But the ministers of God, who foresee, and openly declare, these approaching days of visitation and recompense, must expect to be reviled as wild enthusiasts, or as weak and foolish men: for God leaves sinners under delusion, because of the greatness of their crimes and their enmity against him. But if carnal men deem the servants of God fools and madmen; these know, and can prove, them and their flattering teachers to be so. Happy are they that have watchmen placed over them, who walk with God, seek his glory, do his work, and enjoy his assistance and blessing: many such there have been, and are; may the Lord increase their numbers and prosper their labours! But more have been found crafty and selfish, ensnaring men in error and iniquity, and misleading them into the ways of ruin for their own mercenary ends; increasing men's hatred of God, and of each other, and thus disturbing and defiling even the house of the Lord. Alas! many parts of the Church are as corrupted as Benjamin was in the days of Gibeah, and may expect similar visitations. At some times and in some places, a people are formed by divine grace, who are peculiarly delightful to our holy God; but then a falling off commonly succeeds, and some separate themselves to this shame, and others to that, according to the different abominations which they have loved. Thus they go out from true believers, because they were not of them; and their glory soon vanishes and appears no more.

How soon could our God insensibly waste the most populous nations! And what an alloy it is to our comfort in our beloved children, to reflect for what purposes they may be brought up and reserved! This is a sore vanity: but submission and confidence in God, and a conscientious performance of our duty, form the best remedy of it. Surely it is far more desirable to be written childless, than to bring up families in the service of sin and Satan! And they who provoke God to depart from them, can reasonably expect nothing but wo for themselves and their offspring, here and hereafter. The Lord will drive wicked and hypocritical professors with abhorrence out of his house, and love them no more: his wrath dries up the root and withers the fruit of all our comforts: and the poor scattered Jews, whom God hath cast off because they did not hearken to him, and whom he hath condemned to be wanderers among the nations, are a daily warning to us to beware, lest we neglect or abuse his Gospel: for how then could we escape a similar, or even a more terrible, condemnation?

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1—3. Israel had often been compared to a vine, which is valuable only for its fruit: but the nation was become an empty vine, that brought no fruit to perfection. They not only spent their abundance on themselves; but even their apparent good works sprang from ostentation or other selfish motives, and not from regard to the glory and will of God. As they were enriched by the produce of their good land, they multiplied altars and images; which had a goodly show of devotion, but were an abomination to the Lord. They vainly attempted to divide their hearts between him and idols, which were his rivals; and thus they were found guilty of violating the covenant of God, and of forfeiting all the blessings of their relation to him. By the Assyrians, he would certainly destroy their altars and images: and they should be left without any king to head or protect them, and be forced to confess, that because they had not feared the Lord, no king could do any thing effectual to preserve them from ruin. ' A king cannot protect us, if God be against us.' (Louth.) (Marg. Ref.) (Notes, 2 Kings xv.)

V. 4. The Israelites, in professing to covenant with God, or make vows to him, spake lies and joined perjury to hypocrisy. In swearing allegiance to their princes, they Peniel; and at length again he sent him to Bethel, to pay his vow that he had made in the day of his distress. (Marg. Ref.) But his descendants, regardless of all vows, warnings, and obligations, set up even at Bethel their golden calf, and turned that house of God into a house of vanity by their vile idolatry. Yet it was the Lord of hosts, or armies, which Jacob had met with in these places, who was to be known by that memorial to all generations: and he was as able to deliver them, as he had been to deliver their ancestor; so that they needed not seek help from an arm of flesh. Let them therefore turn to him, and keep mercy and judgment, or righteousness, and wait on God continually, and they should at length experience his power, mercy, and truth, as Jacob had done. The Jews did this in some measure under Hezekiah, and were marvellously delivered from Sennacherib: but the Israelites, who entirely neglected it, were soon destroyed by Shalmaneser.

V. 7-9. Ephraim prospered, by becoming a merchant. The word signifies a Canaanite: the Israelites conducted trade upon Canaanitish principles, covetously and iniquitously; using false balances, cheating by various artifices, and loving to oppress the poor. Thus they grew rich, and they supposed that providence favoured and approved of them. They ascribed their wealth to their own industry, and thought it a substantial advantage: and though the prophets might condemn them, they were satisfied that they could not be detected in any iniquitous methods of growing rich, that could properly be called sin, or deserve the wrath of God. What was not absolutely to be justified might at least be executed. But the Lord, who as their God had so favoured them, even from their deliverance from Egypt, would drive them from their stately houses, to dwell in mean and moveable tents, as wanderers among the nations; even such tents as were used on the days of the solemn feast of tabernacles. Some indeed interpret this of future mercies in reserve for Israel, notwithstanding their sins; and suppose that the joy of the feast of tabernacles is referred to. (Zeeb. xiv. 16-19.)

greatly aggravated Israel's crimes. They had used parables, illustrations, and similitudes, to explain and enforce their messages; but all to no purpose. It is probable that this was written some time after the inhabitants of Gilead had been carried captive by Tiglath-pilezer, (2 Kings xv. 23.) 'Do ye think that there was more iniquity in the Gileadites that are already carried away captive, than in you? Surely the rest of Israel is in the same case; they all lie open to the same judgment. They sacrifice to their idols in Gilgal also.' (Bp. Hall.) In short, their altars were as numerous as the heaps of dung laid on the plowed field, or of stones gathered out of it.

V. 12-14. The people ought to have remembered the low condition of their progenitor; as well as his plain, honest, industrious character, and his pious confidence in God. When he went into Mesopotamia, (or the country between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris;) he was so destitute, yet so diligent and skillful, that he laid the foundation of his future provision, and even of his family; by serving fourteen years as a shepherd for his two wives, Rachel and Leah, and cheerfully enduring hardship all that time; from which low original all their subsequent prosperity arose. And surely they ought not to despise the prophets, when the Lord by his prophet Moses brought the nation out of Egypt, and preserved them from the destructive rage of Pharaoh. But they had most bitterly provoked his anger, by despising his prophets and abusing his goodness; they should therefore perish in their sins, with their blood upon their own heads: and he would turn upon them the contempt and reproach, which they had cast on him and his servants. (Marg. Ref.) Some think that the passage is connected with the preceding verse, in this manner. Jacob fled to Gilead from Mesopotamia, where he had been a servant and fed Laban's sheep, for his wives, &c. And God by his prophet Moses led Israel to Gilead, when he delivered them from Egyptian bondage. Yet the inhabitants of Gilead which had been thus distinguished were carried away captive: and could Ephraim expect to escape? Mahonaim, where the angels met Jacob, as he returned to Canaan, was in the land of Gilead, (Gen. xxxii. 2. 2 Sam. xvii. 26, 27;) and Peniel, where he ployed their ingenuity in framing other idols: and when these were taken from them, they made others in their stead. The kings, and priests, and other zealous worshippers, required those who brought sacrifices to "kiss the calves." (Marg. Ref.) By a peculiar arrangement, the word for men is, in the original, next to that for calves. "The sacrificers, a man, the calves shall kiss." That man (Adam), whom "God made in his own image" and likeness," nay, man favoured with the oracles of God, should degrade himself by kissing, as an act of adoration and love, the lifeless image of a mean brute, is a wonderful proof of stupidity and depravity! Thus Cicero describes a statue of Hercules as having its mouth and chin worn something smoother, because they (the worshippers,) used not only to adore it, with prayers and thanksgivings, but also to kiss it!—Some render it, "Let the sacrificers "of human, kiss the calves." But it does not appear, that man sacrifices were offered in the worship of the calves.

V. 3, 4. To punish these abominable idolatries, the state of Ephraim, like his goodness, (vi. 4.) would be as the morning-cloud, the early dew, the chaff before the whirlwind, or the smoke out of the chimney; i. e. violently and speedily made to vanish and disappear. For after all that the Lord had done for Israel, from their deliverance out of Egypt, they ought to have acknowledged and worshipped no other god, but him alone; for none but he was, or could be, a Saviour, or Deliverer of his people, from temporal or eternal ruin: (Note, Is. xliii. 10, 11.) This may also be understood as a prophecy of what the Lord would do for them in future times.

V. 5-8. The Lord had acknowledged, regarded, and provided for, Israel in the wilderness; when otherwise they must have perished by thirst, because it was a land of great drought. Yet when they entered Canaan, and were like cattle placed in a good pasture, they gratified their appetites to excess, and their hearts were lifted up in pride. This caused them to forget God and their obligations to him, and so they apostatized to gross idolatry. Therefore he would meet them in vengeance, with the fierceness of a leopard that watches by the way to seize upon the travellers; with the fury of a savage bear enraged by the loss of her young; with the force of a lion, or as the most terrible beast that inhabited their forests. "They never venture" to fire on a young bear, when the mother is near: for if the cub drop, she becomes enraged to a degree little short of madness; and if she get sight of the enemy, will only quit her revenge with her life." (Cook's Voyage.)

V. 9. "One hath destroyed thee, O Israel," (that is, "Thou art destroyed.") Thou shouldst have trusted in me for thy help: but having forsaken me, thou art destroyed. Israel did not trust in God for help, and Sennacherib triumphed over them: Hezekiah and Judah did trust in God for help, and were delivered from him. This seems the construction and sense of this verse; and the meaning is nearly the same as in our translation. "O "Israel, one hath destroyed thee, but in me is thy help." Israel need not blame others for his ruin; for he had destroyed himself: but he could not save himself, his help was in, and from God alone.

V. 10, 11. The Lord had all along undertaken to be Israel's King and Protector: and the judges that he raised up, delivered the people, by his authority and immediate help. But where was there any that could save them in all their cities; or of all their rulers, which they had set up for themselves? In the time of Samuel they would have a king; and God in anger granted their rebellious request, and gave them Saul, who both during his life and at his death, was the occasion of great calamities to them. And similar had the case been with the kings of Israel, from Jeroboam's revolt to the ruin of the kingdom of the ten tribes by the death of Hoshea their last king. This last event seems especially alluded to. "I will give thee a king in mine anger, and take him away in my wrath." from age to age, which was, as it were, bound up in bags, and laid by in a secure place to be produced against the day of account. (Marg. Ref.) The affairs of the nation were coming to a crisis, as the hour of travail approaches to the pregnant woman, and her sorrows can in no wise be avoided. But the event would be that of a woman who dies without being delivered; for the people would make no more efforts to rescue themselves from their difficulties, than a dead child could do. They were so foolish, that they continued in a situation which must certainly end in ruin, without attempting any reformation or repentance: so that the souls of individuals and the state of the nation would perish together, like the mother and child in the case alluded to. They ought indeed to use endeavours most earnestly, without delay to extricate themselves, before it was too late; but they foolishly neglected or postponed every means!

V. 14. The predictions of the ruin of Israel, as a nation, were connected with an intimation of a merciful and powerful interposition of God to save a remnant of them, as from death and the grave: yet this was but a shadow of the ransom of the true Israel, by the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ, from the wrath of God, the death of sin, the power of Satan, and finally from death and the grave itself at the last day. When Christ died, and was buried, and rose again, he, as it were, disquieted the dominion of death, and was the plague of that king of terrors; and at length he will be the destruction of both death and the grave. This was absolutely determined, and would certainly be accomplished, notwithstanding Israel's sins and miseries. The Lord would not repent of this his purpose and promise: he would even hide repentance from his eyes, as determined not to look at it. The Septuagint renders the middle clause: "Where is thy vengeance, O death? Where is thy sting, O grave? or O hell?" And the apostle seems to have thus understood the passage, though he does not quote it exactly. (1 Cor. xv. 55.) The word translated I will be, is rendered in many versions, Where, both here and in the tenth verse. "Where is thy king?" and only the transposition of a single letter is requisite fully to authorize this construction.

V. 15, 16. Though Ephraim (whose name signifies fruitfulness;) had been so fruitful in respect of the numbers of the people; yet he would certainly be destroyed by the Assyrians, whom the Lord would send against them: as the east wind from the wilderness blights the spreading tree; or as when the springs from beneath dry up, and withers for lack of moisture. Thus his fountain would be dried up; and his treasures, and choice vessels of precious metal and rich furniture, would be spoiled. For when the land had previously been ravaged, Samaria would be desolated, by the most inhuman murder, even of the women and children. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
 V. 1-8.

Humility, with the fear of God, and a dependence on his mercy, truth, and power, forms the grand requisite for honour and advancement, in the service of Israel's God and King. But they who exalt themselves shall be abased; and such as forsake God, to follow idols and iniquities, give a fatal wound to their own prosperity, and are the murderers of their own souls. The way of transgression is downhill, and they who begin to descend, often sin on more and more, till they come into the pit of destruction. — Many would spare no expense in religion, provided it might be regulated according to their own understanding, to suit their own inclinations, and not according to the word of God. In this case they would adore the work of the craftsman, or the creature of their own imagination, with abundant reverence, devotion, and affection; and with as much stupidity, as the Israelites, prostrated themselves before, and kissed, the dead image of a calf! But every fleeting object in nature might preach to such men the vanity of their religion, and the transient continuance of their prosperity. Surely, no one, who has read the Bible, should acknowledge any other God, than him from whom cometh our salvation! And they, that have experienced the power of converting grace, and have walked with God in the liberty of the Gospel, will be effectually preserved from such delusions: for none can be enticed to our worship, who cannot save us from all enemies and evils: and there is no other Saviour, but the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, into whose name Christians are baptized. He takes care of his people, in their lowest estate, and preserves them in every barren desert and land of drought through which they pass. But when sinners under terror of conscience, or in difficult circumstances, obtain ease or prosperity, and then run into excess, are lifted up in pride, or lulled into carnal security, and so forget the Lord, they may expect to be punished with marked severity. This ingratitude, so natural to fallen man, excites his heaviest indignation, and turns his kindness into jealousy, which burns most fiercely against the objects of it. He can torture the inmost soul, and, as it were, rend the caul of the heart of his rebellious and apostate worshippers: nor can

V. 9-16.

We have all destroyed ourselves, and should never so speak of God's purposes, or Satan's temptations, or any other subject, as to forget that our own wilful apostacy and rebellion have exposed us to that deserved wrath, which must have terminated in eternal ruin, had not mercy intervened. Nor can we have any help but from the Lord; and blessed be his name, in him is effectual help; and for us, if we are willing to accept of it. All things are now ready, the mercies of God are infinite, his redemption all-sufficient, his invitations free and unencumbered, his promises exceedingly great and precious; his wisdom, power, and truth are concerned to accomplish them to every believer: he will be the King, the Protector and Ruler, of all who believe, and he will save them completely and for ever: but all other schemes for obtaining safety and eternal life, are as vain as Israel's hope in their kings and judges; whom they rebelliously set up, when they rejected the Lord, and "would not have him to reign over them." What we inordinately desire, will perhaps be given us in anger: and whether granted, or withheld, or taken from us, will be the occasion of wrath and tribulation to our souls.—The sins of unbelievers, with all their aggravations, are laid up in the omniscience of God, as if hid among his treasures: and who can conceive what a long and heavy account there stands out against each of us! Except therefore sinners repent and believe the Gospel, anguish will soon come upon them, as the sorrows of a travailing woman, from which there will be no deliverance. He is then most unwise, who doth not make haste to flee from the wrath to come. For, however men may be alarmed and affected, unless they enter in at the strait gate, and become penitent believers, "new created in Christ Jesus" unto good works," they will as surely perish as the child does whose mother's womb becomes its grave. But the great Redeemer is able and willing to extricate those that call upon him, out of this and every difficulty. He hath paid the ransom of our souls with his blood, and begun his triumphs by his resurrection from the dead: and all, who accept and bring forth the fruits of his salvation, may be assured that he will also ransom them from the power of the grave, and redeem them from death: until he hath forced the devouring monster to disgorge his prey, and till he have become the destruction of the grave, and

"mortality be swallowed up of life." Then will the millions of the redeemed rejoice and praise the Lord, for having destroyed the last enemy, and for having restored them, in body and soul, to a glorious immortality. These are true and faithful sayings: for the Lord hath promised, and "repentance will be hid from his eyes." But without fruitfulness in good works, springing from the Spirit of Christ, all other fruitfulness will be found as empty as the uncertain riches of the world: the wrath of God will wither its branches: the springs that watered it shall become dry, and it shall be spoiled, and come to nothing.—In short, tribulation and anguish belong to those who have rebelled against God, and their woes will be far more terrible than any that are experienced in that cruelty and carnage, which often attend the storming of populous cities. From such miseries and murders, and from sin the fruitful parent of all sorrow, good Lord, we beseech thee to deliver us!

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1-3. This chapter is very different from the general tenour of the preceding prophecy; and perhaps it was delivered after the reduction of Samaria, and the ruin of the kingdom of Israel. Some penitents would be found among the scattered remnant, who would need encouragement. Others might be brought to repentance by means of their afflictions: and these exhortations, and promises, imply predictions of future events to the nation of Israel and to the Church of God. (Marg. Ref.) Israel is here exhorted to return to the Lord; JEHOVAH had always been known as their God; and they might expect all blessings from him by virtue of the covenant made with their fathers. They must renounce their sins and idols, by true repentance, by faith in his mercy and grace through the promised Redeemer, and by diligently attending on his worship and service. Thus they would be recovered from that ruined state, into which they had fallen by their iniquities and idolatries. In order to this, they must take (not legal sacrifices, but) words expressive of the desires of their hearts, and with them address the Lord. In order to guide their prayers, the prophet showed them what words suited their case. They first must entreat God to take away all iniquity: (conscious that they could neither expiate, nor subdue their sins;) and beseech him to receive them graciously; to take them of his rich mercy into his family, and to confer on them all the blessings of salvation. Then with their lips they would proclaim his praise, and give him the whole glory of their salvation.

flow from a contrite heart, are far more pleasing to God, than ten thousands of bullocks and rams; as being uniformly connected with a disposition to "look unto the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world." We should not therefore, under any distresses, even when we have fallen by iniquity, turn away from God, but rather turn to him as our only Refuge and Salvation. We should first beseech him to teach us what to ask, and how to ask: and when the words of the Holy Spirit correspond with our desires, we should take them with us, and present them before the Lord, that it may be done unto us according to them. We must especially be earnest with him to take away all our iniquity: if that be pardoned we are happy; as nothing but sin can prevent our receiving all good from our gracious God: and surely the whole glory of our salvation, and every possible expression of praise and gratitude, are justly due to our merciful Deliverer; and we can never refuse him the cheap but honourable sacrifice of the calves of our lips. But the true penitent will also evince his sincerity by renouncing his former sins and carnal confidences: he does not want such sources of satisfaction or such refuges of lies; since he has learned to trust in the tender love and compassion of that God, "in whom the "fatherless findeth mercy," and who "withholds no good thing from them that walk uprightly." They who thus come before God, will surely find him ready to heal their backslidings, how great and many soever they have been: he will love them freely, and turn away all his indignation from them: he will refresh their souls with the dew of his grace; he will render them holy, amiable, steadfast, fruitful, and useful: and others will repair to them, and grow up into the experience and fruitfulness of the Gospel, through their converse, example, and prayers. Thus the cause of God revives in one place or another, from time to time; believers ripen for heaven, or grow more serviceable on earth; God is glorified, the Church increased, and sinners saved. Still the Lord waits to be gracious, and he observes with pleasure the broken hearted penitent; he is ready to refresh every weary soul; and to make those joyful and fruitful, who were most barren and disconsolate; for "from him is all our fruit found." May he give us that wisdom and prudence, which lead to the knowledge, experience, and practice of these things; may we learn to walk in the right ways of God, as his righteous servants; and may none of us, being disobedient and unbelieving, stumble at the word of his grace.

BOOK OF JOEL.

It is uncertain at what time Joel prophesied: some think he predicted those calamities which Amos lamented, (Am. vii.) others, that he lived afterwards. He prophesied to Judah exclusively; whether before or after the captivity of Israel. He foretold or described a terrible judgment on the land, by locusts and drought; which has also been considered as typical of the calamities that were about to be brought on the nation by the Chaldean armies and other invaders. These predictions were attended with earnest exhortations to solemn fasting, repentance, and prayer, and with promises of returning peace and prosperity. The conclusion contains prophecies of the glorious times that were coming under the Gospel-dispensation, and of the righteous judgments to be executed on all the enemies of God and his Church. In this he coincides with the other prophets; who, (with perhaps the single exception of Jonah,) all more clearly predict, or more obscurely intimate, these great events. But the most remarkable prophecy in Joel, is that which the apostle Peter quoted on the day of Pentecost, and which is more than once referred to in the New Testament. (Comp ii. 28—32 Acts ii. 16—21. Rom. x. 13—16.) The effects of opposing it, to the Jewish nation in particular, are here foretold in the fullest and plainest manner: and the event to this day fully attests Joel's divine inspiration — The style of this prophet is allowed by the most competent judges, to be exceedingly beautiful: and few remains of ancient poetry (none, except those preserved in the sacred Scriptures,) contain such an assemblage of elegance, pathos, and sublimity, as are found in his writings. Whatever obscurity appears to us, is wholly in the subject; for the language is uncommonly perspicuous: and consequently the critics have proposed much fewer alterations, than in the more concise, sententious, and obscure prophecies of Hosea; nor has our translation of it been exposed to similar objections.

CHAP. I.

The prophet describes the entire destruction of the fruits of the earth, by drought and noxious insects, 1—7. He calls on the people to lament over their calamities, with prayer and fasting, 8—17. He cries to God for them, and represents the vry beasts as joining in his supplications, 18—20.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 2, 3. The prophet opened his subject by calling upon the aged men, and all the inhabitants of the land, to attend to the events which were about to take place. None of them could remember such dire calamities, nor had any such befallen Judah since it was a nation. They ought therefore to speak of them to their children, that the account might be transmitted by one generation to another, to warn them not to provoke God to punish them with similar judgments. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. The exact difference between these several species of insects, cannot easily be explained. Probably they made their appearance in succession, at different seasons of the year. Sometimes one, and sometimes another of them, had been used to cause a partial devastation of the fruits of the earth; but on this occasion they followed each other, till they had utterly destroyed the whole. Indeed some think that this was the case for several years together, and that it was an emblem of the repeated invasions and devastations of the Chaldeans. We have no history of the completion of this prophecy; if indeed the passage be not historical rather than prophetic. 'A future event which might be averted by repentance is spoken of, as having already taken place, to enliven the description; by setting the images before the eye of the reader.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 5-7. The prophet, considering the effects of this visitation, called on the drunkards to awake and bewail their miseries. Their sins, and the danger to which their souls were exposed, had failed to rouse them from insensibility: but this judgment was suited to affect them; as it would deprive them of their idolized indulgence, and force them to be sober in the most distressing circumstances. For though these insects were small and easily crushed; yet their unnumbered multitudes would render them as formidable as a mighty and populous nation invading the land. Their teeth, suited to destroy the vegetables and bark the trees, would be more formidable than those of a lion; and they would leave nothing growing, but leafless and naked stems.

V. 8. Judah was here called upon to lament on account of her miseries, as a betrothed virgin, who should be deprived of the intended and beloved husband of her youth, before the completion of her marriage; that is, with exceedingly great and unfeigned sorrow. This intimated how very heavy their calamities would be.

V. 9. Some of the priests would piously lament the suspension of sacred ordinances, on so melancholy an occasion: the rest would naturally mourn over the diminution of their revenues.

V. 11. The husbandmen would be ashamed of their unsuccessful labours, in cultivating their fields and vineyards; as neither their skill nor industry, on which they would be apt to depend, could prevent the most terrible famine: all their expectations would be frustrated, and they confounded for having entertained them.

V. 12. Because. "Surely all joy," &c. The joy of harvest, and all joy in outward things, must cease, during such a famine. (Hab. iii. 17, 18.)

V. 13. 'He shows, that the only means to avoid God's wrath, and to have all things restored, is true repentance.' The priests, especially those who kept the watches at the temple, are here called on, to set the people an example of humiliation before God. Instead of going to rest, or spending the watches in Psalmody; let them lie all night on the ground in sackcloth, and employ themselves in confessing their sins and deprecating the wrath of God. (2 Sam. xii. 16, 22.) To suppose, that they were only to sleep in sackcloth, instead of their ordinary covering, quite enervates the exhortation.

V. 14, 15. The priests no doubt had great influence in appointing fasts, though the authority of the kings was generally interposed. They were not only called upon to lament before God themselves, with every expression of humiliation and repentance; but to appoint and keep holy a solemn season of public fasting and prayer: the elders (or the princes and rulers of the people) were directed to convene at the house of the Lord, to join in humbly deprecating his displeasure, and seeking forgiveness of their sins; and all the people were required to lament, that they ever saw such a day, which seemed to be a time of judgment and vengeance; and of destruction, rather than of correction, from the Almighty. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. Neither priests nor people could now frequent the temple with peace-offerings, or sacrifices of praise, or joyfully celebrate their festivals, as formerly they used to do: they could only come before God to mourn and complain, because of their sins and miseries.

V. 17, 18. A terrible drought, as well as locusts, &c. was predicted or described: and dry hot weather often in those countries precedes the coming of the locusts. The failure of the crops rendered granaries and barns useless; and the offending cattle groaned under the calamities inflicted for the sins of men. (Notes, Rom. viii. 18-23.)

V. 19, 20. All the produce of the land was consumed as by fire: so that even the beasts seemed to join the prophet in beseeching God to deliver them from their distresses: and thus they shamed those Jews, who refused to call upon him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
 V. 1-7.

The word of God, among its other manifold uses, is intended to explain the dispensations of providence; that the Author, the cause, the support, and the remedy, of every affliction may be made known. What the Lord hath taught us in this school, we should carefully impart to our children; that they may receive the benefit without the anguish, of our salutary chastisements. The most insignificant insects, at God's command, become more tremendous to proud man, than even herds of savage beasts, or armies of hostile invaders; how then should we fear the power of his wrath, who can so easily arm the whole creation against us, or lift up his own heavy hand to crush us at once! The more inordinately men indulge their appetites, the heavier calamities must press upon them: whereas habitual self-denial and temperance prevent the most distressing effects even of impoverishing losses. It is well, if any temporal sufferings serve to awaken the drunkard, the epicure, and the sensualist, to lament for their sins, and to flee from the wrath to come. But what must be the feelings of those who continue insensible, till they fall into that place, where not a drop of water can be procured to alleviate their misery; and where their howling and weeping will be without extenuation, intermission, or hope for evermore? The bitter howlings, the confusion, and anguish, the hardships and miseries, which are the effects of extreme famine, should teach us to be thankful for a land of plenty, to be contented with a moderate portion, and to be temperate, kind, and pious in our use of it.

V. 8-20.

We are so dependent upon God in every thing, that no human wisdom or power can provide plenty, when he pleases to send scarcity: without his rain, the seed-corn must perish, the trees of the field must wither, and all our temporal joys must sicken and die: and such judgments are emblems of the great day of retribution, which will soon come as a destruction from the Almighty. Even the brute creation groan under the effects of man's sins; and they seem, in their way, to cry and complain to the Lord, that without their fault they are reduced to perish by hunger and thirst, through the wickedness of their oppressor and tyrant, man! How stupid then are sinners, who are insensible under such judgments, or only lament with a rebellious and unhumiliated sorrow! We should never rest in any expressions of mere grief; but should also humble ourselves before God on account of those sins which have provoked his chastening-rod. All our other sorrows should lead us to that "godly sorrow, which worketh repentance unto salvation not to be repented of." We ought chiefly to grieve under outward afflictions, when they deprive us of the comfort and benefit of divine ordinances, or when joy and gladness are cut off from the house of the Lord. No self-denial, humiliation, or continued self-abasement before God, should appear too great, as there is yet hope of forgiveness of our sins and deliverance from everlasting misery. The ministers of God especially should set the example, and use their influence, to promote a spirit of repentance and piety amongst the people. Public solemn seasons of fasting and humiliation, attended with the assembling together of the honourable of the land, as well as of the multitude, to confess their sins, to bow down before God, and to pour out their prayers unto him, are proper means of averting national calamities. And though many will observe them formally, or wholly neglect them; yet the Lord will hear the united prayers of the remnant of his servants, and often for their sakes rescue a guilty nation from impending destruction. They who would excite others to such duties, must take the lead in them, as being greatly affected and desirous of affecting them. Thus individuals will find the comfort of acceptance with God, whatever may become of nations that proceed to greater ungodliness; and they will enjoy their gracious recompense, when the wicked and all their possessions shall be burnt up with the fire of the Lord's indignation.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1-3. (Note, Num. x. 1-10.) The priests were directed to blow the trumpets at the temple; and to alarm the people who assembled here, with the prospect of the near approach of these judgments; that the report might thence be diffused throughout the whole land, and all the inhabitants might tremble at God's word, and be induced to repent and deprecate his displeasure. The Lord was about to execute judgment on a guilty nation, as on a solemn day of vengeance. The visitation by the locusts seems to have been primarily intended: but the calamities preceding, attending, and following the destruction of the city by the Chaldeans, might also be referred to. This approaching day of the LORD would be a day of darkness, &c. and as the morning spread upon the mountains: its light would resemble the faint glimmering of the dawn, which appears on the eastern mountains, and just deducts from the midnight darkness, that obscures the earth in gloomy and cloudy weather. This may refer to the immense multitudes of the locusts, which have often been known to obscure the sun at noon-day, and to render the regions through which they pass, for the time, more dark and dismal, than during the night: or it may describe the state of the people's minds, which were filled with a horror little short of despair. This darkness and horror would result from the invasion of a mighty nation, attended with such effects, as the Jews had never before witnessed, and such as would not occur again for many ages. The progress of this army would resemble that of a conflagration: the lands, on which they had not entered, appeared verdant and fruitful, even as the garden of Eden; but they would make such entire destruction wherever they went, as to leave every place behind them like a barren wilderness.

Ever the like. The locusts which plagued Egypt are described after the same manner. (Ex. x. 14.) In both places we are to take it, as a proverbial expression, to set forth the extraordinary greatness of the judgment, and not to understand it too strictly, according to the grammatical sense of the words. (Louth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4, 5. It hath been often observed, that locusts greatly resemble horses in the shape of their heads: the impetuosity of the progress made by these ravagers would be like that of horsemen; their noise heard at the distance of several miles, would be as tremendous as that of chariots of war rattling over the mountains, or like that of a vehement fire consuming combustibles with great crackling and fury; and their progress at the same time so regular, that they would resemble a well-disciplined army upon the march, or attacking the enemy. Many have with admiration observed this to be the case with the immense flights of locusts, which often ravage those eastern regions. (7-9.)

V. 6. Not paleness, which may be occasioned by sickness, or fainting, or slighter terror; but blackness, like that of the countenances of those who are expiring in convulsions, or whose blood is suspended from circulation by some inward or outward violence. The extremity of horror and anguish is intended.

V. 7-9. 'The particles of similitude here, and in the fourth and fifth verses, show that real locusts are described, and not the Assyrian army.' (Bp. Newcombe.) — 'This we lately saw, in our part of the country: for when swarms of locusts came, and filled the lower region of the air, they flew in such order, by the divine appointment, and kept their places as exactly, as when several party-coloured stones are skillfully placed in a pavement so as not to be an hair's breadth out of their several ranks. Every place lies open to them, for they infect not only the fields and the fruits of the earth, but creep into cities, houses, and the most secret recesses.' (Jerome in Louth.)

V. 10, 11. These figures denote the universal consternation and commotion which these judgments would occasion. (Marg. Ref.) Even the kings, princes, and priests, would be filled with horror, and betray the utmost signs of trepidation; the whole land and all orders of men would be agitated, as by the most tremendous earthquakes, and all that commotion of the elements which attends those destructive convulsions. The authority and influence of the rulers and great men would be suspended, and the constitution unhinged; as if the sun and moon should be darkened, and the stars should withdraw their shining; in which case the natural world would be reduced to the utmost confusion, and chaos would return again. In like manner, on this occasion, the whole of the Jewish nation and its government would be reduced to confusion and darkness. For the Lord was about to muster his great army, to lead them to the assault, give them the victory, and powerfully execute his word. His day would be very terrible, and who could abide it? To which question, the answer doubtless would be: none but those who previously sought refuge in his mercy by penitent faith and prayer. The language here used may well be supposed descriptive of the destruction of Jerusalem, and the desolations of the land by the Chaldeans; and will have a literal accomplishment at the end of the world.

V. 12-14. From these predictions the Lord, by his prophet, took occasion to exhort the people to the only method in which they could hope to avert his judgments, or be recovered from the fatal effects of them. Let them turn to him with fasting, and weeping for their sins; let them not be satisfied with the customary tokens of humiliation, such as rending their garments, &c.; for this would be vain, except their hearts were broken in self-abasement, and self-abhorrence, godly sorrow, unfeigned contrition, and resolute separation from their sins. To encourage them thus to turn to the Lord and his service, Joel reminded them that he was slow to anger, and of great kindness even to the most atrocious offenders; and ready to forgive their sins, and to put a stop to the progress of his judgments, when they humbled themselves before him. There could be no doubt of his forgiving every true penitent: and who knew whether he might not return to them as a nation, and avert the public calamities that were otherwise coming upon them? At least they might hope, that he would mitigate the severity of the judgment, and leave part of the fruits of the earth, as a blessing for them, after the locusts had finished their depredations; out of which they might present before him a meat-offering and a drink-offering; that he might not lose the honour, nor they the comfort and benefit, of their solemn worship. This tended to instruct them what part of the calamity ought most to afflict them.

V. 15—17. (Notes, i. 14. Ex. xix. 10—15.) The priests and rulers were again, and more particularly and earnestly, excited to announce the observance of a solemn fast, to be kept as a holy day to the Lord. Let them convene the congregation of Israel into the courts of the temple, and prepare the people by external purifications and proper instructions, for the profitable solemnizing of the day. Not only the elders and the grown people, but even the children and the sucking infants, must be present as a part of the congregation. And that the consideration of the calamities in which they would be involved, might the more affect the minds of their parents; newly married persons, forgetful of the concerns and satisfactions peculiar to their situation, must be wholly engaged in the public humiliation and lamentation of their people. The priests, as the ministers of God, were to take the lead: and standing before the porch of the temple and the altar of burnt-offering, where they might most conveniently be seen and heard, they were required to weep for the sins and troubles of the nation, and to beseech the Lord to spare his people and heritage, though deserving of punishment; and not to let them be utterly ruined by famine, and thus left enfeebled and destitute, to be reproached, insulted, and enslaved by idolaters; who would blasphemously inquire, What was become of Israel's God and Protector? This has been considered as an intimation, that other calamities, besides that of the locusts, were intended in these predictions.

V. 18—20. Whenever the elders, priests, and people of Israel should thus turn unto the Lord, they would find him jealous for the honour of that land, where his temple stood and his name was worshipped, and ready to rescue it from famine and the oppressions of idolaters; and he would be compassionate to the miseries of his people, though brought upon them by their sins. They would then receive encouraging answers to their prayers, assuring them of an abundant supply of all their wants, and of every thing conducive to the enjoyment of life; nor would he again suffer the heathen to insult over them. He would also drive away the vast army of locusts, which from the north had invaded the land, into the deserts betwixt the southern extremity of the Dead sea and the Mediterranean sea, where they should die: and no effect of their ravages should remain, except the stench occasioned by the putrifying of so immense a quantity of insects; though they had done and threatened such immense mischief. 'Jerome relates, that in his own time, the heaps of locusts which were driven by the winds into the sea, afterwards putrified upon the shore, and so corrupted the air as to bring a pestilence.' (Lanthe.) The locusts in Languedoc were about an inch in length, of a grey colour. The earth in some places was covered four inches thick with them, in the morning before the heat of the sun was considerable: but as soon as it began to grow hot, they took wing, and fell upon the corn, eating up both leaf and ear; and that with such expedition, by reason of their number, that in three hours they would devour a whole field. After which they again took wing, and their swarms were so thick, that they covered the sun like a cloud, and were whole hours in passing. After having eaten up the corn they fell upon the vines, the pulse, the willows, and even the hemp, notwithstanding its great bitterness. After this these insects died, and stunk very much.' (Philosophical Trans.)

V. 21—24. The land had been represented, by a bold figure, as mourning over its desolations, and the beasts as groaning, and even crying to the Lord, because of their sufferings, (i. 10. 19—20;) and here the promises of returning plenty and prosperity, are introduced by a poetical address to the land and to the cattle. (Marg. Ref.)—As the locusts had done great things in destroying the fruits of the earth, the Lord would do great things in redering the fields and pastures abundantly fruitful. The cattle would speedily be supplied with plenty; for the pastures, in those parts of the country which were least populous and cultivated, began already to spring; and the fruit-trees were again covered with the several valuable productions: so that instead of sorrow and fear, the land and its inhabitants, and the beasts of the field, would exult for joy and gladness. 'As the cattle had their share in the death; so now they shall receive comfort in the return of plenty.' (Lowth.) "The children of Zion," however, ought not only to rejoice in the temporal abundance bestowed on them, but in the Lord their God; considering him as the Giver of all their comforts, and using them to his glory. The first month answered to the latter part of March and the former part of April; and the latter rain, at this season, served to fill the ear, and prepare the corn for the sickle. The barley-harvest seems to have begun generally in the first month; but the wheat-harvest was later. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 25. The great abundance of the plentiful years should replenish the granaries and store-houses, which had been emptied in the years of famine.

My great army. 'We have here a key to the grand and beautiful description, which runs through these two chapters. Every reader of taste must be struck with the poetical and sublime manner in which the allegory is conducted. There is not a more splendid piece of poetry extant.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 26, 27. There can be no doubt concerning the primary meaning of this prophecy: but some expressions in these verses so accord to those used in respect of the deliverance of the Jews from captivity, their subsequent prosperity and security, and the prevalence of true religion among them, (Marg. Ref.) that it is not unreasonable to suppose, that the former part of the prophecy, couched under the primary meaning, a prediction of the desolations made by the Chaldeans; and the latter part, under the primary meaning, a prediction of the blessings in reserve for the nation, after their return from captivity, till the coming of Christ, and also after their conversion to him. (Notes, &c. xxxiv. xxxvii. xxxviii. 21—29.) 'My people shall not be disappointed of the trust they place in me; nor be reproached by the heathen, as if I had forsaken them.' (Lowth.)

V. 23-32. The apostle Peter quoted almost the whole of this passage, in addressing the Jews on the day of Pentecost, as a prediction of those events which then began to take place. It stands in the history (Acts ii. 16-21,) nearly according to the Septuagint; yet with some immaterial variations. The apostle also cites it, as predicting the conversion of the Gentiles, (Rom. x. 11-21.) After the events, before more expressly foretold, or "in the latter days," the times of the Messiah, the LORD promised to "pour out his Spirit upon all flesh." "Though the Jews only are enumerated, there is a latent reference to the effusion of the Spirit on the Gentiles also, in the times of the Gospel-dispensation." (Bp. Newcombe.)
 This promise began to be accomplished on the day of Pentecost, when the Holy Spirit was poured out on the apostles, and on the assembled multitude, of whom great numbers were converted; and it was continued in the converting grace and supernatural gifts, conferred on the Jews and Gentiles through many nations. Their the sons and daughters of the Jews became prophets, and exercised many miraculous powers; both old and young men were favoured with prophetic dreams and visions; and even servants and hand-maidens, though in a state of slavery, were made partakers of the sanctifying grace and the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit. But it is predicted, that about that time God would begin to show signs of his awful displeasure against the Jewish nation; and that extraordinary appearances in the heavens and upon the earth, would be presages of the approaching destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish church and state; which would be attended with immense bloodshed, terrible conflagrations, and pillars of smoke, such as ascend from the

CHAP. III.

Prophecies of divine judgments to be executed upon the enemies of God's peoflames of burning cities. Then would the sun, moon, and stars be darkened, or be turned into blood: this foretold either the tremendous appearances in the heavens which preceded these calamities; or the total unbinding of the Jewish constitution, the subversion of all rule and authority in church and state, and those horrid intestine convulsions and massacres, which made way for the final destruction of the city and temple; by the just judgment of God, who on that great and terrible day of vengeance poured his wrath on the devoted Jews by the hands of the Romans. But in the midst of all these calamities, there would be deliverance and salvation for all who should "call upon the name of the Lord." "This St. Paul explains of those who give themselves up unto Christ, and profess themselves his disciples." (Louth.) "Neither is there any way, or means to escape the terribleness of this judgment, but by believing in the Lord Christ, and calling upon his name. For in the Church of God only shall salvation be had, and deliverance from the wrath to come, which salvation shall lie open, both to the believers of the Gentiles, and to the remnant of those Jews whom the Lord shall call." (Bp. Hall.)—It is evident, that what is here spoken of "calling on the name of JEHOVAH," is repeatedly in the New Testament applied to "calling on the name of Christ." And it is remarkable, that those who embraced Christianity, and "honoured the Son even as they honoured the Father," separated from the unbelieving Jews before the siege of Jerusalem, and were preserved from the miseries here predicted: while the unbelieving Jews, though they professed to "call on the name of the Lord," were overwhelmed by them: for "he that honoureth not the Son, honoureth not the Father." He "that hath not the Son, hath not the Father;" and the Supreme Being which is worshipped by those who refuse adoration to EMMANUEL, is not the true God, "The God of Abraham," "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;" but an idol, the creature of vain man's reasonings and imaginations.

In the remnant, &c. This seems more immediately to point out the Jews who embraced Christianity in the primitive times: yet it may also include all, whether Jews or Gentiles, to the end of time, who shall be called to the fellowship of our Lord Jesus Christ. (Starb. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

If the alarm of approaching temporal judgments should be given to offending nations and churches, that men may tremble, and seek to avert the impending storm, surely the ministers of the Gospel should be very earnest in warning sinners to seek deliverance from the wrath to come! The day of judgment with its decisive consequences will soon arrive: but what a day of darkness and gloominess will that be to the impenitent workers of wickedness! And how far will its terror exceed all that ever was experienced or imagined on earth! Yet those horrors will be but as the morning, or the entrance on, the subsequent endless state of misery and despair. Our business therefore here is to secure an interest in Jesus Christ, and his eternal salvation. The meanest executioners of the wrath of God can soon consume all our outward comforts, and turn an earthly paradise into a dreary wilderness. We can neither resist, flee away, nor shelter ourselves, when "the Lord mustereth his host for the battle." What then will be the case, when "the heavens and the earth shall pass away with a great noise, the elements shall melt with fervent heat, and the sun, and moon, and stars shall for ever withdraw their shining?" Then "the Lord Jesus will be revealed in flaming fire, with his mighty angels," to execute his threatened wrath; and who can abide that great and terrible day? All temporal calamities therefore should warn us to prepare for this final judgment.

V. 12—27.

So great is the mercy and grace of our God, that, instead of sternly saying to his rebellious subjects, "Depart from me," he invites, yea, commands them to turn unto him. But this must be done with our whole heart, in unreserved and unfeigned repentance, faith, and obedience, with self-abhorrence, hatred of sin, godly sorrow and humiliation, and mortification even to lawful satisfactions, whilst engaged about so important a concern. But fasting, weeping, and mourning, and every outward indication of self-abasement, though highly proper, may yet be delusive and hypocritical: so that a broken and contrite heart is more pleasing to God, than rending garments, wearing sackcloth, and rolling in ashes; and the renunciation of sins that once were dear to us, is a better proof of repentance, than floods of tears, and most bitter wailings and lamentations. If we truly humble ourselves before God, we may also take encouragement from the assurance of his mercy and grace; "for he is slow to anger, of great kindness, and ready to forgive." He will certainly save every believer from the final consequences of his transgressions; but it is not equally certain that he will prevent or remove the painful temporal consequences of them, or immediately speak peace to his conscience. Yet, who knoweth but he may thus return, and repent of the evil that was about to come upon us, and give us comfort when we forebode nothing but bitterness?

Whatever the Lord gives or withholds or takes away, we should still count it a blessing to have an opportunity of attending on his ordinances; and that portion of our substance, which is employed in his immediate service, will be the source of the greatest comfort. Those who are in authority should use their influence in calling people to observe seasons of public fasting, humiliation, and prayer for national blessings, in times of peril or calamity: ministers ought to instruct the people how they may observe such seasons in a holy manner: men of superior rank should sanction them by their attendance on sacred ordinances: no age, sex, or character, should be exempted: all private concerns should be postponed to the public duty: and when the ministers of God lead the service, with fervency and affection, and join weeping with their supplications, the people will be the more earnest in calling on the Lord to spare his heritage, that his enemies may not rejoice, as if he were not able or willing to protect his worshippers. Happy is that people who thus humbly and uprightly seek the Lord! he will be jealous for them and have compassion on them: he will plead their cause, avert his judgments, drive away their enemies, answer their prayers, and supply their wants; and the greatness of those things which have been done against them, shall only enhance their gratitude for the still greater things that the Lord will do for them. Indeed the sons of Zion can never have so great a cause to fear, but they must still have a greater "to rejoice" and be glad in the Lord their God: he "gives grace" and glory, and no good thing will he withhold from "those that walk uprightly." He gives us all our comforts, and enables us to use them with thankful hearts: and "though he cause grief, yet he will have compassion" according to the multitude of his mercies." The wisdom, truth, and love of his dispensations towards us deserve our highest admiration: he makes us know by happy experience, that he dwelleth in the midst of us; and he will never leave his people to be ashamed of their confidence in him.

V. 28—32.

We have at present no scriptural ground to expect that he will pour upon us or our children the extraordinary gifts of his Spirit, or that they shall see prophetic dreams and visions: yet we may hope and pray for the pouring out of his Spirit on us and on ours, as the Author of all holiness, wisdom, and consolation. No age or description of persons is excluded from this expectation; and the gifts of our ascended Redeemer are sufficient to render the poorest slaves, wise, rich, and happy.—These sacred influences prepare the soul to meet the Lord: but the neglect or contempt of them shuts up the sinner under aggravated condemnation. The Gospel calls men in general to partake of these blessings, and of that salvation which is revealed and placed in the Church: and whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord Jesus, as the Son of God and the Saviour of sinners, shall be delivered from the wrath to come. This is the happy case of that remnant of every age and people whom the Lord calleth by his regenerating

Spirit: all things shall work together for their good: they may look forward with comfort to the day when nature shall expire in convulsions, assured that then their eternal redemption shall be perfected. Let us therefore seek for and rejoice in this salvation; and let us still pray for the pouring out of the Spirit upon all flesh, in still greater abundance than in the primitive times, that the earth may be filled with truth and righteousness; encouraged by that fulfilment of these prophecies and promises, which hath beyond doubt already taken place.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1, 2. The following prophecy relates to the latter times of the world, when upon their conversion God shall deliver the Jews from their oppressors, and restore them to their own land. Since all nations are summoned to answer the impeachment here mentioned, we may suppose the word Israel to comprehend the faithful in all ages: and then we may observe that the judgments denounced against the Church's enemies, are chiefly for their hatred and cruelty against his servants. (Louth.) The restoration of the Jews, and the final decisive victory of true religion over all opposers, are the events more especially foretold. (Notes, Is. xxxiv. Ez. xxxviii. xxxix. Rev. xix.) It does not appear that these predictions at all referred to any of the judgments executed on the enemies of the Jews after the Babylonish captivity: but it is evident that they are not yet fully accomplished; and that they coincide with various other prophecies. (Marg. Ref.) The preceding chapter led us, in the series of prophecy, to the establishment of Christianity, the destruction of Jerusalem, and the dispersion of the unbelieving Jews. This was called "the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem," from which God will bring them back by their conversion to Christ; and this event will be attended, or followed, by the more complete calling of the Gentiles into the Church. At that period the Lord will gather, in his providence, all the nations which continue at enmity with his people, that by warring against them they may bring destruction on themselves. The valley of Jehoshaphat may either mean the valley in which the Lord destroyed the numerous enemies of that prince; (2 Chr. xx:) or, alluding to the word Jehoshaphat, which signifies the Lord hath judged, it may refer to the judgment which God will denounce and execute on his enemies. Then and there he will plead the cause of his people, and avenge them upon those who had scattered them amongst the nations, and seized upon their land.

V. 3—8. These verses represent the indignities and cruelties, which have been exercised on the Jews and on the Church, in different ages ; and which will at length be all brought into the account : and whilst one special time of retribution is predicted, terror is spoken to all those in every age, who are guilty of such crimes. The enemies of the Jews took them captives and enslaved them : yet they valued them so little, that they made them the stake in games of chance ; nay, they used to sell a boy or girl into perpetual bondage, for the hire of a harlot, or for wine to make them drunk ! But what right had any of the oppressors of the Jews, or of the Church, (of which Tyre, Zidon, and the Philistines are mentioned, because of their vicinity to Canaan,) thus to intrude upon the Lord's property ? If they meant to retaliate on the Jews for the judgments, which God had executed by them on their progenitors ; he was determined speedily to return their recompense upon their own heads. They plundered his people to enrich themselves, or the temples of their idols ; and they sold them to be conveyed into far distant nations : but the Lord intended to restore them from their dispersed state, and avenge them on their oppressors, to give his worshippers the ascendancy, and to enable them to reduce their foes to a state of similar debasement and misery. There are no events recorded in history, that entirely correspond with these predictions : perhaps the ruin of the Pagan Roman empire, which had destroyed Jerusalem and dispersed the Jews, might be adverted to ; but the grand accomplishment seems to be yet in futurity, and the event alone can fully clear them up.

12 Let the heathen be wakened, and come up to d the valley of Jehoshaphat : ° for there will I sit to judge all the heathen round about.

17 So ° shall ye know that I am the LORD your God dwelling in Zion, ° my holy mountain : there shall † Jerusalem be † holy, and ° there shall no strangers pass through her any more.

V. 9—17. This is a challenge publicly proclaimed to the enemies of the Jews and of the Church, to excite themselves and each other to a combined assault. Let not on'y such as had been trained up to arms, draw near ; but let the husbandmen change their instruments of tillage into swords and spears ; let the feeble and timid assume courage and affect strength ; and let the heathen collect all their forces to battle against the worshippers of JEHOVAH. The mighty ones, whom the Lord was entreated to cause to come down, may either mean those potentates, that he would bring down as appointed to the slaughter ; or those that he would employ as the executioners of his vengeance. Some explain it of angels, as ministers of his vengeance. His enemies would come down to battle, expecting victory and triumph ; but He would bring them down as criminals to be judged, condemned, and executed. As their wickedness had been great, and they were ripe for judgment ; the Lord would order his angels, or his people, to put in the sickle, to reap the harvest, and to gather and tread the vintage which would be very copious. Immense multitudes would be collected into the valley of decision or judgment, or threshing ; where their cause would be decided and their doom pronounced, and executed in the approaching day of the Lord, which would be attended with most alarming prodigies. The Lord would roar against them out of Zion, as they were to be punished for their hatred to his cause, and their injuries to his people. Then the whole visible creation would be thrown into the most violent commotions, as if the final dissolution of all things were come ; but in the midst of all these terrors, the Lord would enable his people to hope and rejoice in his mercy, truth, and powerful protection, and thus strengthen them against their fears and temptations. They should know and experience his gracious presence in his Church; and he would render her holy as well as secure; and preserve her from the injuries and intrusions of heathens, infidels, and such as were strangers to the power of godliness. (Note, 1, 2.) Nothing took place, in the interval between the captivity and the coming of Christ, either in respect of the nations that fought against the Jews, or the purity and peace of Jerusalem, at all answerable to this energetic language. Strangers, one after another, took Jerusalem, and even polluted the temple: and after the coming of Christ, the Romans destroyed both, and they have ever since been "trodden under foot of the Gentiles." But the Scriptures referred to in the margin, show that almost all the prophets foretold the same final victory of the Church over all the nations that oppose it; about the time when the Jews shall be converted, and restored to their own land, and just before the millennium, when "the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ." The sublime description cannot but lead the reader to think of the end of the world, the day of judgment, and the heavenly Jerusalem: but events preceding the millennium are evidently predicted.

V. 13—21. At the time here foretold, a most abundant communication of divine influences will attend the administration of God's ordinances; there will be a rapid increase of converts, who will grow in grace, fruitfulness, and consolation in an extraordinary manner; and the Gospel will spread very speedily into the remotest corners of the earth. These events are predicted under significant emblems: it will be, as if the mountains should of themselves distil wine and milk in abundance; and every part of the land should be well watered, and exceedingly productive. That, spiritual blessings are principally to be understood, appears from the prediction, "that a fountain should come forth of the house of the Lord, and water the valley of Shittim," (Notes, Ezek. xlvii.) "So the holy waters in Ezekiel are described, as running—as far as the Dead sea, the east part of which bordered on the country of Moab, within whose border was the valley of Shittim." (Num. xxv. 1.) (Louth.) In this verse, (18) either the times of the Messiah are described, or we have a description of Jerusalem, after its final restoration, when a golden age shall commence among its inhabitants, and when the knowledge of God and his Christ, shall a second time be widely diffused from it. —(Is. lxi. 19.) There shall be a signal difference between Egypt and Idumea, whose people shall be lost in the mass of other nations, and whose sovereignty shall not be restored; and Judah and Jerusalem, whose inhabitants shall be reinstated after their captivity; and on their future return, shall dwell for ever in their land, JEHOVAH displaying his glory among them.' (Bp. Newcombe.) The word blood, (21) may signify pollution in general. But the words chiefly import, that God will pardon the Jews the great crime of shedding the blood of Christ, upon their sincere repentance; and the guilt of which they had imprecated on themselves and their posterity; (Matt. xxvii. 25;) and had felt the effects of God's displeasure on that account, for many ages.' (Louth.) The spread of the Gospel and the progress of the work will be attended by the ruin of such nations and persons as shall persist in opposing them: on whom vengeance will be taken for all the violence and persecutions that they have committed. From this period the Church will continue in a state of peace and prosperity to the end of time: the Lord will then purify her from all the errors, abuses, and pollutions, which have hitherto defiled and deformed her. For he dwelleth in Zion, among his people, and will at length render his cause triumphant.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The appointed period of the troubles to which the Church and the believer are exposed, is frequently a day of vengeance on their enemies and persecutors: and all who have scattered, plundered, or injured the servants of God, will certainly be called to a severe account. Whilst men spend upon one vice what they gain by another, they rapidly treasure up wrath against the day of wrath, and show the atrociousness of their impiety and profligacy. Enmity to God and persecution of his people have generally been connected with the most degrading sensuality. But how wonderful is it, that men can sport with the miseries of their own species! can give a momentary worthless gratification, a decided preference to the most important interests of their neighbours, and can subject them to the extremity of hardship and anguish, without reluctance, from such vile motives! The Lord will review all these infamous transactions in due time: he will utterly disregard all the compensations, that oppressors would make for their crimes, by ostentatious liberality or hypocritical shows of piety; and their opposition to his will can avail nothing; but swiftly and suddenly will he return their recompense upon their own heads. He will make them refund their treasures, which they have gotten by sacrilege, persecution, oppression, and cruelty; or by selling his rational creatures, or his worshippers, for slaves as cattle, tearing them from their beloved relatives, and removing them far from their borders. They cannot be sure, but that they may fall into the hands of those whom they have thus cruelly injured: and perhaps their wrongs may be retaliated on them or their children; and their ill-gotten estates may descend with this encumbrance to their heirs.

V. 9—20.

Most dreadful, yet deserved punishment, will certainly be inflicted on all impenitent oppressors, and sinners of every description, when the Lord shall call the nations to his tribunal. As men ripen for his judgments, they are cut down like the harvest by the executioners of his vengeance: and the whole multitude will shortly be assembled to hear the righteous sentence denounced against them. He, who now reigns on a throne of grace, as a merciful Saviour, will then avenge himself on the despisers of his grace, and the opposers of his cause; and his wrath from mount Zion will be more tremendous, than that from mount Sinai. But amidst all the trials of life, in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment, the Lord will be the Hope and Confidence of his people, and the Support and Strength of the children of Israel. Various degrees of peace, prosperity, and purity have been, and will be, found in the Church on earth; and we should look forward in hope and with earnest prayers, for those glorious days, which are foretold: but in heaven alone will perfect holiness and felicity be enjoyed. No strangers will enter the Church triumphant, to defile those happy regions; no sin, temptation, or infirmity will then disturb our peace: for the Lord will fully cleanse every one of the blessed company previous to their admission; that he may manifest his presence and love with them for evermore. May we then be numbered with his saints in glory everlasting?

BOOK OF AMOS.

Though this prophet was of Tekoa, a city in the tribe of Judah; (2 Chr. x. 5, 6;)—yet he dwelt in Israel, and prophesied chiefly against that kingdom. He was a shepherd, and herdsman, and a gatherer of sycamore-fruit, (vii. 14;) but rural employments were general and honourable among his countrymen. However, in the words, “I was no prophet, neither was I the son of a prophet,” he seems to distinguish himself from those who were educated in the schools founded by Samuel. He borrows many images from the scenes in which he had been engaged; and gives them force and dignity, by the closeness and grandeur of his manner. We shall find in him many affecting and pathetic, many elegant and sublime passages. No prophet hath more magnificently described the Deity; or more gravely rebuked the luxurious; or reproved injustice and oppression with greater warmth and a more generous indignation. An eminent judge and master of style, (Bp. Lowth,) pronounces him nearly equal to the very first prophets in elevation of sentiment and loftiness of spirit; and scarcely inferior to any in splendour of diction and beauty of composition’ (Bp. Newcombe).—Amos was cotemporary with Hosea: but it is supposed by the most competent judges, that he began to prophesy before him, and continued in his office a much shorter time. He has been confounded with Amoz, the father of Isaiah: but the names in the original are very different. He delivered prophecies against several of the neighbouring nations, and against Judah; but he exercised his ministry chiefly in Israel. In coincidence with the other prophets, he foretold the captivity and dispersion of the whole house of Israel; their preservation in this dispersed state, as a distinct people; the coming and kingdom of Christ; the conversion of the Gentiles, the final triumphs of the Church, and the future restoration of Israel: and that part of these predictions, which has been most wonderfully accomplished, is a sure pledge for the fulfilment of all the rest. Two of his prophecies are expressly quoted in the New Testament; (Com. v. 26, 27. with Acts vii. 42, 43. and ix. 11, 12. with Acts xv. 15—17;) in both of which his prophetic character is strongly attested.

CHAP. I. V. 1. There is no certainty in any of the conjectures that have been formed concerning this prophet; and we know nothing more of him, than what is intimated in his prophecy, (vii. 14, 15.) The former years of Uzziah coincided with the times of Jeroboam, the grandson of Jehu. (Note, Hosea i.) We find elsewhere, that a terrible earthquake happened during the reign of Uzziah, and it is recorded by Josephus, and is a general tradition among the Jews, that it took place, when Uzziah invaded the priestly office, and was smitten with a leprosy. Yet, as Jotham, who managed the affairs of the kingdom when Uzziah was smitten with leprosy, was not born when Jeroboam died; this opinion is worthy of little credit. The earthquake, however, seems to have been very tremendous; and it is mentioned as such by Zechariah several ages afterwards. When the prophet collected his predictions, he added this respecting the time when the first was delivered.

V. 2. (Marg. Ref.) Joel uses nearly the same expressions, as those with which Amos begins his prophecy. In Jerusalem and on mount Zion the Lord dwelt among his people, on a mercy-seat; but he would thence denounce and execute judgments, more terrible than the roaring of a lion, on his enemies, and especially on idolatrous and hypocritical Jews and Israelites. For by a drought he was about to desolate the countries, not so much as sparing the habitations of the shepherds, or leaving any verdure on the most fertile mountains and regions.

V. 3-5. The prophet first began with denouncing judgment against the several oppressors of his people. Damascus was the capital of Syria. Three and four, or seven transgressions, do not mean an exact number of offences, (Marg. Ref.) but intimate that in many things the persons spoken of had provoked the wrath of God, and were ripe for vengeance: and one offence is mentioned as more aggravated than the others, which was the immediate cause of their calamities. This, in the case of the Syrians, was their oppression of the inhabitants of Gilead beyond Jordan, whom they treated with as great cruelty, as if they had threshed them with threshing instruments of iron: or perhaps they actually tortured, in this inhuman manner, such of them as fell into their hands. (Marg. Ref.) 'This alludes to the threshing wain, described by Isaiah, (xli. 15.) It moved on serrated wheels, and at once forced out the grain, and cut the straw.' (Bp. Newcombe.) 'Hence the word is used for the weak being crushed by the mighty.' (Lowth.) Therefore, the wrath of God, as a consuming fire, would enter the house, or among the descendants, of Hazael king of Syria, and consume those palaces that Benhadad his predecessor had erected at Damascus, or those which his son Benhadad should inhabit. The Lord would also break down the bar of that city, open her gates to the besiegers, cut off the inhabitants of the open country, wrest the sceptre from the hands of the reigning family, and carry the people captive into Kir, in the land of Medea. This sentence seems to have been executed by the Assyrians. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6-8. Gaza, Ashdod, Ashkelon, and Ekron, were the principal cities of Philistia: probably Gath was at this time in the possession of the kings of Judah. The Philistines had added to their other crimes a recent instance of cruel revenge against the people of God. On some occasion, they had taken captive a multitude of Jews or Israelites, and had sold the whole company as slaves to the Edomites, who would be sure to treat them with the utmost rigour. The Lord would therefore no longer delay to punish them according to their deserts; but would destroy their cities, dethrone their princes, and extirpate the remnant of the nation. This was executed afterwards by the Assyrians, Jews, and Chaldeans.

V. 9, 10. The Tyrians had forgotten the brotherly covenant, that had subsisted between David and Solomon kings of Judah, and Hiram king of Tyre; and their treaties of amity, which had been entered into for their reciprocal advantage; and they had been guilty of great cruelty to the nation, after the example of the Philistines. This provoked God to send those judgments upon them, which were afterwards inflicted by Nebuchadnezzar and Alexander the Great. (Notes, Is. xxiii. Jer. xlvii. Ez. xxvi. xxxviii.)

transgressions of ^a Edom, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof, because he did pursue his brother with the sword, and ^a did cast off all pity, and his anger did tear perpetually, and he ^a kept his wrath for ever.

12 But I will send a fire upon ^a Teman, which shall devour the palaces of Bozrah.

13 ¶ Thus saith the LORD; For three transgressions of ^a the children of Ammon, ^a and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof, ^a because they have ^a ripped up the women with child of Gilead, that they might ^a enlarge their border:

V. 11, 12. Edom, or Esau, was Jacob's brother; yet the Edomites were more cruel to the descendants of Jacob, than any of the strangers by whom they were surrounded! After the example of their progenitor, they pursued the israelites with the sword: they readily purchased them for slaves from those that made them captives: they were void of compassion towards them, and full of furious revenge, which they vented in the most outrageous cruelties: but this would kindle the fire of God's wrath against their strongest cities, and reduce them to desolation. This was executed by the Assyrians and Chaldeans, and others, and finally by the Jews. (Notes, Is. xxxiv. lxiii. 1—6. Jer. xlix. 7—22. Ez. xxv. xxxv. Ob.)

V. 13—15. The Ammonites, to the east of Gilead, were as cruel to the inhabitants of that district, as the Assyrians to the north had been. Their enmity and avarice had induced them to be guilty of the most horrid barbarities, in order to extirpate the people, and to enlarge their border. This was about to bring down the vengeance of God on Rabbah, their capital city, which would be taken by storm, and destroyed suddenly as by a whirlwind; and this would be succeeded by the captivity of the king and his princes. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord hath often chosen the instruments of his work, in the sacred ministry and in important services, from inferior stations in society: and they need not be ashamed of their mean extraction or former low occupations, and should not be reproached on account of them, provided they faithfully discharge the duties to which they are called. The neglect of warnings from God frequently precedes the execution of his severe judgments: and whilst, from his throne of grace, he delighteth to exercise mercy to the humble believer, he will thence denounce and execute the severest vengeance on his enemies. He bears long with transgressors; but he will no longer turn away the punishment of those who have filled up the measure of their guilt. Cruelty to the helpless, and persecution of his people, ripen nations and individuals for destruction with great rapidity. His wrath consumes flourishing families and magnificent palaces, like a tremendous fire: it breaks down the gates of fortified cities, depopulates fertile regions, dethrones princes, and reduces potent nations to captivity and slavery. Thus oppressors are visited in rotation, according to the degree of their cruelty, treachery, violation of relative duties, or contempt of sacred treaties; or to that of their enmity and oppression. "They shall have judgment without mercy, who have showed no mercy," and such as cast off all pity for their brethren, and they whose wrath and revenge have raged perpetually against them, have no right to expect any mercy from God. Yet what cruelty will not men commit, to increase their estates! And what villany will not ambitious princes countenance, in order to enlarge their territories! But the day of retribution will come on such inhuman monsters, as an overwhelming tempest and an irresistible whirlwind: and what will they then do? or whether will they flee from the vengeance of God, and from the devouring fire of his incensed justice?

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1. Because, &c. The Lord notices this expression of impotent revenge of the Moabites, against the dead body of an idolatrous prince, and assigned it as a reason of the severe judgments that he was about to inflict on that people.

good, in raising up prophets from among their sons, to instruct them in his service; and he had continued this favour to the kingdom of the ten tribes, even after their revolt from the family of David, and separation from the temple and worship at Jerusalem. He had likewise raised up among their young men, Nazarites, to be examples of self-denial and devotedness to God. But, instead of profiting by these undeniable and extraordinary benefits, they tempted the Nazarites to break their vows; and by authority, threatenings, and persecution, endeavoured to silence the prophets. (Marg. Ref.) 'They would not endure that their idolatry and other darling sins should be re-proved.' (Louth.)

V. 13. Israel was become, as it were, an intolerable burden to the Lord: they so dishonoured and provoked him, that he was weary of them, and was pressed down by their obstinate provocations, like a cart when heavy laden with sheaves of corn. 'Therefore I will press your place, as a loaded corn-wain presses the sheaves.' (Bp. Newcombe.) (Is. xxviii. 27.) Provoked by their crimes, he would entirely destroy their cities and habitations. (Marg.) The illustration, according to either rendering, is taken from the scenes in which the prophet had been conversant.

V. 14—16. "For the flight, &c." Neither agility, vigour, numbers, contrivances, nor valour, would deliver the people from the judgments which were coming upon them: few would escape, and those few would be destitute fugitives in other countries, or naked captives in the hands of their enemies. The desolations occasioned by the earthquake before-mentioned (i. 1.) may perhaps be here referred to; but the destruction of Samaria, and the captivity of Israel by the Assyrians, must principally be intended.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In what varied and horrid forms do the malignant passions of the human heart break forth, on different occasions! But the Lord keeps an exact account of the conduct of ungodly men even towards each other; and he will punish every expression of a vindictive and cruel disposition, towards the living or the dead. They who insult over the fallen or the miserable, may expect to be insulted over, perhaps when in extreme agony; and to die "with tumult and shouting and with the sound of a trumpet;" and judges and princes, when ringleaders in wickedness, may have the pre-eminence of more aggravated misery than their subjects. But it is a small thing for those, "to "whom are committed the oracles of God," to avoid the gross enormities of benighted heathens; without such crimes, they may fill up a large measure of guilt, and ripen apace for vengeance, "by despising the law of the Lord," and not keeping his commandments;" and by preferring their own imaginations or inclinations to his holy truths, ordinances, and precepts. False doctrines, delusive superstitions, idolatries, and atrocious violations of God's word, have often been perpetuated by tradition in the visible church; and one generation after another has "erred through the lies, after which their fathers have walked;" till the wrath of God have burned like fire, to consume even the palaces of Jerusalem. When known crimes are deliberately ventured upon for worldly gain, men will by degrees perpetrate the basest villanies for the lowest recompense, and will become callous to all the miseries of the poor: nay, they will take pleasure in trampling on the righteous and the meek, out of contempt and enmity to their characters! Such nominal Christians will grudge the poor servant, labourer, and mechanic the smallest advantage or indulgence, and eagerly pursue every iniquitous method of extorting their little from them, to increase their own abundance. Injustice and rapacity are generally accompanied with sensuality and licentiousness, and lead to impiety, infidelity, or abominable idolatry. But no wrongs will be so fatal to the injurer, as those that are done to the poor and meek, who cannot, or will not, avenge themselves. —When the obligations are considered, which professed Christians have received from God in his providence; and by his word, ministers, and ordinances, and the good examples set before them; it must be evident, that their crimes are far more aggravated than similar practices of ignorant Pagans. But they, who hate self-denial and piety themselves, will commonly attempt to seduce such as profess them, either to renounce or disgrace their profession: too many, that seemed to run well, have thus been led into those "worldly lusts which war against the soul;" and as "every one that doeth evil, hateth the light," we need not wonder at the pains which wicked men take to silence, intimidate, or corrupt the ministers of God. Thus they add obstinacy to iniquity, and do the work of Satan, as well as that of the fallen children of Adam. When this becomes the general character of churches or nations, it cannot be expected that the Lord will any longer endure them; but they will be given up to complicated misery, notwithstanding all their idolized power, courage or resources: nor can individuals, who profess, and thus disgrace, the Gospel, escape the future wrath of an offended God.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—3. This chapter begins another message from God, which was addressed to all the posterity of Jacob. This whole family, which the Lord had brought out of Egypt, had been owned, noticed, and favoured by him, in such a manner as no other people had been; especially in having his oracles and ordinances amongst them, and being admitted into a covenant-relation to him as his worshippers. But instead of being, on that account, connived at in their wickedness, his honour required that they should be punished with distinguished severity. They could not reasonably expect to continue in friendship and peace with God, and under his protection, whilst their conduct was directly contrary to his holy law. Without coincidence in judgment, inclinations, and pursuits, men cannot be intimately united in friendship, or live together in harmony and comfort. They, therefore, who do not count the Lord worthy of all love, honour, worship, and obedience, do not love his law, regard not his service as liberty and felicity, dislike his way of saving sinners, and seek not his glory, cannot walk together with him in his ordinances, commandments, and providence. Notions, forms, sects, or outward conduct, cannot supply the want of conformity to God, which must be derived from the regenerating grace of the Holy Spirit. (Note, Gen. v. 22—24.) Can two go together, except they meet by appointment? As a journey, in which two engage, supposes a settled meeting; so the denouncing of God's designs by his prophets shows that he has in de himself known to them. (Bp. Newcombe.) Others seem to put the same construction on this verse; and the context rather favours it. Yet it does not appear how the prophet's mission could thus be proved, till his predictions were accomplished; and certainly the instruction, on the preceding interpretation, is very important, and accords with the plain meaning of the words, and the general tenour of Scripture.

V. 1, 3. These animated interrogations were intended to convince the people that they had cause for alarm, and should earnestly seek to avert the threatened wrath of God.

The lion in the forest, and the young lion in the den, are observed to roar over their prey, or are urged by hunger for want of it, when they have it in view, or are devouring it, and not at other times: in like manner the Lord would not have "roared out of Zion," had he not marked out the idolatrous Israelites as the objects of his righteous indignation, which was about to seize upon them with irresistible force. Birds are not caught in a snare by chance; but it is laid for them, and generally not taken up, till some of them be ensnared: so the calamities, which befel the people, were the effect of the Lord's purpose of punishing them for their sins; and would not be removed, till they had effected their reformation or their ruin. The trumpet announcing the approach of the enemy would excite the people to run together, and concert measures for their security: and ought not Israel to take the alarm, at the terrifying messages delivered to them in the name of God? They would not surely ascribe their troubles to any other cause; for was there any evil or calamity in a city that was not from him, and the effect of his wrath? Indeed he would do nothing, (especially respecting Israel,) without revealing his secret purpose to his servants the prophets; who, being thus informed of what was about to come to pass, must declare it to the people, that they might take warning and act accordingly. Nor could they do otherwise; for who could help trembling at the roaring of a lion? And who could help prophesying, when the Lord God spake to him of the judgments which he was about to execute upon transgressors? The people ought not therefore to blame the prophets for their awful predictions; but to approve their conduct, and to take warning to repent and return to God, if so be his wrath might be averted or deferred. The grand outlines of the plan of divine providence, and the events of history, to this day and to the end of the world, were made known to the prophets of Israel and Judah: and a vast proportion of them many ages before they took place: so that a general history of mankind, as to the most important facts, might be composed from their writings. Yet, these prophets excepted, no nation has had fewer good authors, no nation has been more generally unnoticed or despised.

V. 9—15. The heathen neighbours of Israel, and those who had most oppressed and annoyed them, were summoned to assemble at Samaria, that they might behold their crimes and punishment. There they would behold a city full of tumults, occasioned by vice, injustice, and oppression; to which they were so habituated, that they knew not how to act honestly or conscientiously; but were continually storing up the gains of violence and robbery, even in the palaces of their kings and nobles. For these crimes the Lord, in vindication of his own honour, would send the Assyrians to invade the land, and besiege the city, and level it with the ground. The inhabitants would then be so massacred, that only a few obscure persons would escape. As with great difficulty and danger the shepherd recovers some small remains of the sheep, that a lion hath devoured, which shows what is become of those that are missing; so a few individuals, who had hid themselves under their beds, or wrapped themselves up in some fragment of its covering, to escape the sword of the conquerors, would at length be brought forth, to be carried away captive. Or some who had fled to Damascus, being pursued thither by the common enemy of Israel and Syria, would thus be with difficulty preserved from slaughter in their beds. For the prophet was to testify to the family of Jacob, that when the Lord should arise to punish their transgressions, he would be sure to destroy the altars of Bethel, and avenge on them that base idolatry: and that the winter-houses and summer-houses, which the great men had for luxury, as well as all their decorated and magnificent palaces, would be entirely destroyed by their enemies. Benhadad agreed that Ahab should build streets in Damascus: (1 Kings xx. 34.); and probably many Israelites dwelt there. 'This prophecy may have been delivered, when Jeroboam the second was in possession of Damascus.' (2 Kings xiv. 28.) (Bp. Newcombe.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is lamentable to consider how often peculiar advantages only serve to increase the guilt and punishment of their possessors: we should therefore take heed not to presume on external privileges, without special sanctifying grace. The proud, the sensual, the covetous, the unmerciful and deceitful, cannot enjoy communion with a holy God: he can have no pleasure in them, nor they in him. And as all our happiness must arise from his love and from walking with him, we should be the more earnest in seeking conformity to his image, as connected with reconciliation to him through Jesus Christ. Let none suppose that the threatenings of God's word were intended merely to frighten them, or that he hath no ground for the severity which is denounced, or that he does not intend to execute it. Impenitent sinners are the prey against which he utters his tremendous voice, and not one of them will escape his righteous vengeance. Their present troubles spring from his anger, and will either end in their repentance or destruction. Surely then, sinners should take warning, and escape for their lives: and we all ought to "submit to God's righteousness," in the evil that he inflicts upon us for our sins. His secret is with them that fear him; and he hath made known the rules of his dealings with us by his holy prophets: nay, his faithful ministers, though not acquainted with his secret counsels by immediate revelation, may see most evidently that judgments are about to be executed on the wicked; and they cannot but speak, that men may fear and flee from impending destruction.—Even idolaters will at length be called upon to witness and to approve God's judgments upon apostates and hypocrites. The tumults of prosperous wickedness, sensuality, and oppression, which blind the understanding, and harden the heart to every sentiment or feeling of justice or mercy, tend to tumults of a still more terrible nature, and provoke the most ruinous judgments of God against nations and individuals. Indeed, "a remnant according to the election of grace" will be secured by our great and good Shepherd, as from the jaws of destruction, in the worst of times; but generally they consist of the poor, obscure, and neglected; whilst the rich oppressors, who store up robbery in their palaces, the delicate, the luxurious, and magnificent, are marked out for judgment; and their hypocritical or idolatrous forms of worship serve only to increase their condemnation.

1—5. Their incorrigibleness under previous visitations, 6—11. They are warned to prepare to meet God, who was about to execute vengeance upon them, 12, 13.

* NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. The cattle of Bashan were remarkable for their size, fatness, and wantonness; and the wealthy, luxurious, and profligate rulers and nobles of Samaria seem to have been intended, though some interpret it of the haughty matrons. But the princes might be described as kine, rather than bulls, to reprove their effeminacy and cowardice when assaulted by their enemies; whilst they crushed and trampled upon their unresisting brethren, and sold them for slaves; saying to the masters, who bought them, "Bring us wine that we may drink." Having made the iniquitous bargain, perhaps on low terms, they required from the purchaser, in this slave-trade, to be treated with wine. But the Lord had sworn by his own holiness, that they and their posterity, should be dragged out of their habitations, as helpless fishes are drawn by the hook out of the water to be destroyed. The wall of Samaria would be broken down by the besiegers; then every one of these oppressors would endeavour to escape by that breach which was nearest to his station: they would cast away the treasures which they had hoarded in their palaces; or they would throw them down there, that they might be the more unencumbered in fleeing from the enemy; and yet they would not be able to escape.

V. 4, 5. This is an ironical or sarcastical address to the idolatrous Israelites. Let them go to Beth-el, or Gilgal, and multiply transgressions: let them offer daily oblations to their idols, and employ in their service the second tithes, which every third year ought to have been consumed in religious feasting with their priests, Levites, and poor brethren, (Note, Deut. xiv. 22—29.) and let them openly present their peace-offerings and free will-offerings to their golden calves, proclaiming the sacrifices and inviting guests, in imitation of the wor-hip paid to God at Jerusalem. For this conduct would be agreeable to their inclinations, and consistent with their character. (Marg. Ref.) "Burn a thank-offering of leaven;" in 'contempt of the law.' (Note, Lev. vii. 11—16.) (Bp. Newcombe.) 'Your hearts are so set upon your idolatrous worship, that it is in vain to use any arguments to persuade you to the contrary.' (Louth.) 'He speaketh 'this in contempt of them who resorted to these places; thinking that great devotion and good intention, had been sufficient to have bound God unto them.'

V. 6. "Cleanness of teeth" signifies, want of food. V. 7. Ruin. 'This was called the latter rain, and the season for it was the first month, which was three months before the wheat-harvest.'

—One city, &c. 'This may import, that God punished Israel with drought, at the same time when he sent rain upon the cities of Judah; making that remarkable difference between Israel and Judah, which he did formerly between Egypt and Goshen.' (Louth.) It is probable, that in Israel those cities which had been most free from idolatry were most exempt from the drought.

V. 9. (Notes, Joel i. ii.) These visitations were suited to convince the Israelites of their sin and folly, and to bring them to "repent and turn to God, and do works meet for "repentance:" but not having this effect, they eventually hastened the ruin of the nation.

V. 10. In consequence of famine, drought, and locusts, dreadful pestilences prevailed in the land; like those with which God had visited the Egyptians, especially when the first-born were destroyed: and in this enfeebled state the people were harassed by the incursions of the Assyrians and other enemies, who slew their chosen young men, and seized on those horses, which at great expense, had been procured from Egypt for their cavalry. Being thus obliged to keep their armies encamped, when pestilence raged, and many were slaughtered, and perhaps left unburied through the distress of the survivors, their camps became exceedingly offensive, and increased the dire calamity.

V. 11. (Marg. Ref.) Perhaps this judgment was the effect of the earthquake, before mentioned, (i. 1.) * You were almost all consumed, and a few of you wonderfully preserved.

V. 12, 13. As the Israelites persisted in rebellion and idolatry, notwithstanding these warnings, judgments, and respites, the Lord was determined to do thus unto them: that is, to bring upon them the calamities that had before been predicted. (iii. 14, 15.) He warned them therefore to prepare to meet him as their offended Judge and Adversary, who was about to denounce sentence, and to execute righteous vengeance upon them by the Assyrian armies. They would then have to contend with the Creator of the mountains; the sovereign Disposer of winds and storms; the heart-searching omniscient Judge, who showeth to every man even his secret thoughts; the Arbitrer of every man's prosperity or adversity, who turneth the morning of hopeful success into the darkness of misery and despair; and the omnipotent Lord, who is able to tread down the stoutest of the great ones of the earth, and to put all enemies under his feet. He was coming against Israel as an adversary; but if any desired to escape his vengeance, it behoved them to submit, and humble themselves before him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The luxurious and cruel oppressors of the poor are often as destitute of manly courage as of compassion; and their wanton tyranny over their helpless inferiors is attended with as abject a servility towards their powerful opposers. — Careless and prosperous sinners will soon be entangled in their own devices, or by the judgments of God, as in a net; and they will be disappointed in all their efforts to escape deserved vengeance. How miserable are they whose religion, the result of their corrupt reasonings and inclinations, serves only to multiply their transgressions! whose diligence, expense, and superstitious devotion, ripen them for destruction; and whose confidence, and self-satisfaction in anti-scriptural observances, prove that they are given over to a strong delusion to believe a lie! Let us then compare our sentiments, conduct, and worship, with the standard of holy Scripture; and pray continually to be guided into the way of peace. What diversified miseries hath sin exposed us to, even in this world! But let us remember, that this is a state of probation and discipline, and that afflictions are employed as rebukes, corrections, and warnings, and should be thus received. For they tend to show the evil of sin, the power of divine wrath, the vanity of this world, the danger of continuing impenitent, and our need of the mercy, grace, and comfort of the Gospel. But when famine and pinching hunger and thirst, when impoverishing dispensations, when wasting pestilences and wars, when earthquakes and conflagrations, when urgent distresses, affecting examples in the case of others, and marvellous escapes in their own, do not lead men to repent and turn to God, and to do "works meet for repentance," they evince the hardness, depravity, and enmity of their hearts, and so display the justice of God in their final condemnation. Ere long we must meet our God in judgment: but we shall never be able to stand before him, if he be severe in marking our iniquities: we cannot deny or excuse our crimes; we cannot withstand, escape, or endure his righteous vengeance: for what can a poor worm do, who hath to contend with the omnipotent, omniscient, and everlasting Creator and Sovereign of the universe? If we would prepare to meet our God with comfort at that awful period, we must now meet him in Christ Jesus, the eternal Son of the Father, who came down from heaven, to bleed and die in our nature, to save lost sinners: we must meet him upon a mercy-seat, by faith and prayer: we must "seek him" whilst he may be found, and call upon him whilst he is "near;" that so his "saving grace may teach and enable" us to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live "soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world;" and then "we shall have confidence, and not be ashamed" before him at his coming."

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—3. The prophet bemoans the state of Israel, as dead and irrecoverably lost. * Those cities or kingdoms, which never were conquered, are called Virgins. "She is forsaken," ^e like an infant that is exposed, or fallen on the ground, and hath none to take it up. (Louth.) God would forsake the people; and there would be none able to raise them from their ruined condition, or to prevent their being carried away into captivity by the Assyrians. They would soon be so diminished and enfeebled by intestine convulsions and foreign invasions, that their cities would not be able to furnish more than a tenth part of their former number of soldiers; and so they would be utterly unable to resist the power of the Assyrian invaders.

V. 4—6. Notwithstanding all these denunciations, the Israelites would have nothing to blame for their ruin, except their own obstinacy in rebellion. Still the Lord assured them, that if they would seek him, they should live, and be preserved from their enemies; that is, if they sought his favour and protection, by repentance, faith and prayer, and by returning to his worship and service. And any individuals, who thus sought him, would save their souls alive, and might perhaps be rescued from the general ruin of the nation. But they must not imagine, that going to worship the calves at Beth-el, or Gilgal, or Beer-sheba, (which probably was in the hands of the kings of Israel at that time,) would avail them any thing. All the worship and sacrifices presented in those places, were an abomination: and they must protest against them, as I seek the Lord according to his word. For Beth-el and Gilgal, and their inhabitants, idols, priests, and worshippers, would fall into the hands of their enemies; and none of them would be able to avert or to quench the fire of God's indignation, which was about to devour the house of Joseph, or the kingdom of Israel, of which Ephraim and Manassah formed a principal part. "Beth-el shall become Acen," or vanity. The house of God was become the house of idols, and would soon be utterly ruined. 'The idol you worship will not be able to deliver you, but will itself be involved in the common calamity.' (Louth.)

V. 7—9. The rulers of Israel were here particularly addressed: their iniquity rendered their judicial proceedings a source of oppression and misery; and they had left off all regard to justice, as well as to religion, throughout the land. Thus they provoked that glorious God, whose favour they should have sought: even Him who had created the stars in their constellations, which were supposed to have a great influence on the seasons, for rain or drought, for plenty or scarcity. For he could as easily raise men from the depth of misery to felicity, or cast them down from the summit of prosperity into distress and despair, as he changes the darkness of the night into the light of the morning, or the brightness of the day into the gloom of the evening. He could again pour the waters of the ocean upon the earth, and cause a second deluge, if he saw good; for he is the eternal, self-existent, and all-sufficient JEHOVAH. He could even give strength to a few plundered and dispirited captives, to vanquish the mightiest conquerors, or to take the most strongly fortified cities. What then had his enemies to expect, but inevitable destruction?

16 Therefore the Lord, the God of hosts, the Lord saith thus; Wailing shall be in all streets; and they shall say in all the highways, Alas! alas! and they shall call the husbandman to mourning, and such as are skilful of lamentation to wailing.

17 And in all vineyards shall be wailing: for I will pass through thee, saith the Lord.

18 Woe unto you that desire the day of the Lord! to what end is it for you? the day of the Lord is darkness, and not light.

19 As if a man did flee from a lion, and a bear met him: or went into the house, and leaned his hand on the wall, and a serpent bit him.

V. 10-13. The atheistical and iniquitous rulers of Israel would not regard the prophet's exhortations; he therefore next spake to others concerning them. They hated the prophets, who rebuked the wickedness of the people in the most public parts of the city, without sparing the corrupt magistrates that perverted justice in their courts: nay, they abhorred every one that spake uprightly, whether as an honest witness that came before them, or a magistrate who objected to their perversion of equity. They would not be reproved, because they hated to be reformed. They continually trampled down the poor, and robbed them of the burdens of wheat, which they had gleaned, bought, or earned, for the support of their families; and left them to starve, whilst they were framing splendid palaces and pleasant vineyards for themselves. But the Lord would not suffer them to enjoy their ill-gotten estates; he knew their manifold and atrocious crimes, their impiety, bribery, and extortion, and would take vengeance on them. But the times were so perilous and iniquitous, that prudent persons, except evidently called to it, would choose to keep silence, even from complaining, lest they should excite the indignation of their cruel oppressors.

V. 14, 15. The prophet did not think that it behooved him to be silent; he still exhorted the people to "seek good, and not evil." Instead of having recourse to their idols, or indulging their passions, they should seek the good knowledge, salvation, and ways of the Lord. Then indeed they might hope for the gracious presence of God with them, which they now presumptuously expected, because of their external relation to him. But they could not heartily shun the evil and seek the good, except they hated the one and loved the other; so that a change of their inward disposition was as requisite, as a reformation of their outward conduct. (Marg. Ref.) This would lead them to establish judgment in the gate, by righteous laws and decisions; and then perhaps the Lord might be gracious to the enfeebled remnant of the nation, and recover it to its former prosperity. This probably, was written between the first ravages of the Assyrians, and their more complete success.

V. 16, 17. As the Lord foreknew that these exhortations would be generally disregarded, he assured the people that the approaching calamities would fill the streets of the cities, the high-ways, and the pleasant vineyards, the usual scenes of joy and festivity, with bitter lamentations: whilst the husbandmen, driven from their work, would join the skilful hireling mourners in bewailing the public calamities. For the Lord was about to pass through the land, as he had done through Egypt, when he destroyed the first-born. Those whose trade and practice is to make common lamentation, shall now mourn in 'earnest without hire.' (Ep. Hall.)

V. 18-20. The prophet had mentioned the day of the Lord, and some of the people expressed a desire of its arrival; either scornfully deriding his message, or presumptuously expecting the interposition of God in their favour. But their scorn or presumption would ensure woe to them; the day of the Lord would be to them a season of the utmost distress and despondency, without any mixture of joy and prosperity. One calamity would succeed to another: so that they that escaped the first would be destroyed by the second, or third: as if a man, having fled from a lion, should be met by a bear; or having got into a house fa-gured and alarmed, and leaning against a wall to recover himself, should there be stung to death by a serpent.

V. 21--24. (Note, Is. i. 10--18.) The Israelites were encouraged in presumption, by the observance of religious solemnities. Perhaps, in the temples belonging to the ten tribes, they copied the manner of keeping the solemn feasts, of presenting the sacrifices, and even the music and psalmody, in use at the temple of Jerusalem. But the whole was so corrupted with idolatry, superstition, hypocrisy, and iniquity, that God utterly abhorred and rejected it. Some, however, think that Judah also was included in this rebuke, and on very probable grounds.—Instead of relying on these external and hypocritical services, they would do better to reform the courts of justice; that judgment and equity might thence be diffused, like streams of waters, throughout the land. Thus a hopeful beginning might be made, of reformation in morals and religion, without which no sacrifices could please God.—‘Let justice have its free course, so that the meanest persons may have the benefit of it.’ (Louth.)

V. 25--27. The generation of Israel, to whom the prophet spake, only copied the crimes of their forefathers, even from the time of their leaving Egypt. For almost forty years, during their continuance in the wilderness, the prescribed sacrifices to the Lord were greatly neglected or interrupted; and yet with great toil and expense, they carried along with them shrines or models of the tabernacles in which their idols had been worshipped, with images in them, as learned men suppose. Moloch is a name familiar to the student of Scripture, but nothing satisfactory can be known of Chiun, or the star of their god; perhaps some of the planets or constellations were worshipped under this name, and the image of it might be decorated or distinguished by the figure of a star. (Acts vii. 42, 43.) Some remains of this idolatry, probably, existed in the time of Amos. ‘Hazeal carried away many^a Israelites captives to Damascus: but the king of Assyria^b carried the ten tribes captives as far as Media, at a much greater distance than B. Babylon. (Act. vii. 43.)—‘The captivity of the ten tribes would be far worse than that of the two remaining, and with less hopes of returning to their own country.’ (Louth.) Though the ten tribes might be especially addressed, it is plain, that all the descendants of those Israelites who came out of Egypt, were concerned in the expostulation and the prediction.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

Pious minds will often be constrained to lament over the corruptions and calamities of the visible Church: for if professors of religion provoke God to forsake them, they have none to raise them up from their fallen state. But the true Church, though often distressed and apparently diminished, still maintains its ground, and will again be replenished. Whilst the Judge standeth even at the door, ready to execute vengeance on evil-doers, he still proclaims, mercy to those who will accept of it in his way: but men often expect deliverance, by such idolatrous superstitious forms as only ensure condemnation: and whilst they refuse to seek the Lord, and to come to him by Jesus Christ, that they may live; the fire of divine indignation breaks forth upon them, and none of their devices or teachers can quench it. No man can reasonably disregard the wrath or favour of that God, who orders all things in heaven and earth as he pleases. He destroys countries by drought or fire, by deluges or hostile invaders, in an irresistible manner. He can envelope men in natural or spiritual darkness, or involve them in terror and despair; or he can give light, joy, and prosperity, as he sees good: and whilst oppressors “turn judgment into wormwood, and leave off “righteousness in the earth;” they forget that the Lord can “strengthen the spoiled against the strong,” and execute vengeance on them by the hands of the poor outcasts whom they despise. But hardened oppressors can seldom be induced to fear the wrath or seek the favour of God: they hate the light; and faithful preachers, who speak not good of them, but evil, and rebuke their crimes as openly as they commit them. Intent on enriching and indulging themselves, they trample on the poor, and iniquitously, as well as unmercifully, deprive them of their hard-earned pittance, that themselves may riot in sensuality and magnificence. But the Lord notice all their “afflicting of “the just,” and all their bribery, percculation, and perversion of law and equity; and he will soon terminate their prosperity and oppression together. It is, however, generally prudent for men to keep silence in such evil times, and to leave the matter with the Lord; lest improper intermeddling should render a bad condition still worse.

ture or suffer: they must continue to call on men to " seek " the good and not the evil, that the Lord God of hosts " may be with them;" and as we must learn " to hate " the evil and love the good," if we would acceptably serve God on earth, or be fit for heaven, it behoves us earnestly to plead his promises, and to beseech him to " create in us a clean heart, and to renew a right spirit " within us;" and then all piety and righteousness, and every relative duty, will readily and constantly be attended on. The Lord is ever ready to be gracious to the souls that seek him; and we may hope for his returning favour to the remnant of diminished churches, when they seek him in humility and sincerity. But mourning and lamentation must come on all who neglect him, even in those places where joy and gladness did most abound: and it is a vain presumption for the impenitent and unbelieving to hope for favour in the day of the Lord, which will be to them " darkness and not light, even very dark and no brightness " in it;" for though ungodly men may escape the most complicated temporal judgments, none of them can avoid everlasting destruction. God abhors even the most pompous services of the proud, impenitent, and hypocritical; and is offended at their very songs of praise. But it is grievous to reflect how his word has been disregarded, even by his worshippers, in every age of the Church; and how much more labour, expense, and self-denial, have been exercised by idolaters and the devotees of superstition, than have been observable among those who professed to adhere to the scriptural and spiritual worship of our God.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1. The wealthy and haughty inhabitants, both of Jerusalem and Samaria, seem to be here addressed. They confided in their fortifications and external advantages, carelessly indulged themselves, and were heedless about consequences, though destruction impended over them. Some, however, understand the passage differently. ' The word rendered are at ease, signifies ' also to be insolent; in which sense the words may fitly ' belong to the ten tribes, who despised Zion and the ' temple, " which God chose out of all the tribes of Israel, ' to place his name there." ' Zion, or Jerusalem, and ' Samaria, are the chief seats of the two kingdoms, whither ' is the greatest resort of the whole nation. The Chaldee ' interprets it, who give names to their children, accord- ' ing to the names of the chief of the heathen, to whom the ' house of Israel apply themselves for protection.— ' Thus in the later times some of the Jews took the names ' of Alexander, Antipater, Agrippa, and the like, to com- ' pliment some great men among the Greeks and Romans ' of those names.' Louth.)

V. 2. To show the people what little ground they had for their carnal security, the prophet calls on them to consider some of the neighbouring cities, which had once been flourishing, but probably were then in ruins. Had these cities been more favoured than the kingdoms of Judah and Israel? Or had they been more prosperous? Or was their border larger? That is, did they more deserve the indignation of God for their ingratitude? Or had they more to tempt the avarice of invaders? ' Calneh; a city ' in the region of Babylon; and, as it seems, lately sub- ' dued by the Assyrians.' ' Gath, Uzziah, in whose ' reign Amos prophesied, took this city.' ' Better, greater; ' Why then do ye worship their gods? And why are you ' not grateful to JEHOVAH? (i. p. Newcombe.) The prophet, however, seems to have meant to expose their presumption, rather than their ingratitude. Hamath the great: Not Hamath, afterwards mentioned. (14.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3-8. The persons addressed either thought that no evil would come upon them, or they considered it as very distant: and they supposed that there was no necessity at the present for repentance or reformation. As if they had been assured of prosperity and impunity, they " called for

“the seat of violence,” and openly committed iniquity and oppression, under colour of law and justice. At the same time they laid down to sleep on beds ornamented with ivory, and reclined to feast upon magnificent couches; selecting the best of the lambs and calves for their luxurious and intemperate meals; regaling themselves with songs; inventing instruments of music for their carnal pleasure, as David had done for the honour of God and the service of the sanctuary; and drinking wine, not from small cups, but out of bowls, and to excess; and anointing themselves with the most costly ointments and perfumes. Thus they stupified their consciences, and rendered their hearts callous; so that they disregarded the miseries of their oppressed brethren, and the calamities occasioned to the people by famine, pestilence, and hostile invasions; and those which the prophets foretold were about to come upon them. But these selfish luxurious persons would be the first that would go into captivity; they would be torn away from their luxurious banquets, to penury, slavery, or death. For the Lord solemnly sware by himself, that he abhorred all the excellency of Jacob, or all those things on which the descendants of that patriarch valued themselves; whether they were riches, or strength, or outward privileges, or their empty profession of being God's people; especially their splendid palaces, which were builded and maintained by oppression; and he would therefore give them up to be plundered and desolated by the Assyrians and Chaldeans. The word rendered excellency, often means pride, or arrogance, which God especially abhors. These verses (4-6) are an elegant description of the ill uses men too often make of a plentiful fortune; that it shuts out all serious considerations, makes them void of compassion towards those that are in misery; and to regard nothing but the present gratification of their senses. The words allude to the afflicted state of Joseph, when he was sold by his brethren. (Louth.)

V. 9-11. Previous to that final desolation of the city, the ravages of famine and pestilence would be so great, that none would survive of the most numerous families. Their relations would be constrained to burn the bodies, (which was not customary in Israel,) or bury the bones of the dead, with very little assistance, and in silence and astonishment. They would scarcely venture to express their grievs to their nearest neighbours and fellow-sufferers: and they would despair of pity or help from God, whom they would suppose to have utterly rejected them, and to be ready to add to their punishment, if they presumed to mention his name: thus they would pine away under these calamities, in terror, enmity, and despair. This obscure verse, (10) seems to describe the effects of famine and pestilence, during the siege of Samaria. The carcass shall be burnt, and the bones shall be removed, with no ceremony of funeral rites, and not without the assistance of the nearest kinsmen. Solitude shall reign in the house; and if one is left, he must be silent and retired, lest he be plundered of his scanty provisions. (J. P. Newcombe.) For, at the Lord's command, both their stately palaces and the more humble habitations would be desolated with proportionable distress, and all ranks involved in one common ruin.

V. 12-14. It was as perilous to endeavour to reform the people, as it would be to ride a race on the top of a craggy rock, where both horses and horsemen would be in danger of being killed; and as vain as to plow there with oxen, when no impression could be made or increase expected. Is it impossible, that horses should run upon the steep and craggy cliffs! So impossible is it that ye Israelites should continue to prosper, while ye remain thus sinful. (Bp. Hall.) The ancients did not shoe their horses. The administration of public justice, and even their religious observances, had proved as nauseous as gall, and as poisonous as hemlock; instead of being a source, or an example, of equity and piety. Yet they continued to rejoice in their idols, their wealth, fortifications, or successes, which were things of no value; and they boasted of being able to provide for their own defence; which was as absurd as if an animal should suppose that it had assumed, or could assume, horns by its own strength. These boasts perhaps were occasioned by the successes of Jeroboam, (2 Kings xiv. 23-9.) The Lord would therefore raise up against them the Assyrians and Chaldeans, who would afflict, and at length desolate, the whole land from one end to the other. The mention of “the river of the wilderness,” the border of the promised land on the south-west, shows that Judah, as well as Israel, was intended.

CHAP. VII.

The judgments of grasshoppers and of fire are averted by the prayer of Amos, 1—6. By a wall and a plumb-line is shown the strict justice of God in Israel's punishment, 7—9. Amaziah, the priest, accuses Amos to Jeroboam, and forbids him to prophesy at Beth-el, 10—13. Amos shows how God had called him to prophesy, and predicts the ruin of Amaziah and his family, 14—17.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Careless sinners are every where in danger: but they who are at ease in Zion, and possess seared consciences and vain confidence, under the means of grace, are in the most perilous state; and no pre-eminence in rank or station in the Church, no distinction of sect or party, will secure those who are destitute of the sanctifying grace of God. Nay, every other advantage in this case will tend to increase pride, rebellion, and condemnation. Ungodly men are prone to put off the evil day: they presume that they shall live many years, and that they shall escape with impunity; or at least, that there is no danger yet, nor any need of repentance, self-denial, and prayer. Many of them seek to amass wealth by crimes, and spend it in every kind of self-indulgence, and continued pleasure and dissipation; whilst their ingenuity is employed in inventing new methods of gratification, to numb their consciences and harden their hearts. No wonder then that they become insensible to the miseries of the poor, or to the persecutions of the Church; and that they spend that on their lusts, by which God should have been honoured and his people relieved: for they are continually neglecting, and even milfully murdering their own souls! God must needs abhor the excellency, and hate both the palaces and temples of such professed Christians. Their carnal ease and riotous banquets will soon be removed: and how dreadful will it be, when luxury and excess shall end in hopeless and endless misery! Even on earth sinners may be so loaded with afflictions, or driven to desperation, that sullen silence and astonishment may seize upon them; and every thought of God, of prayer, or of Christ, may increase their agony, and every temper of hell may be experienced and manifested. Men should therefore take warning, not to stifle their convictions, or harden their hearts; and not to discourage the labours of ministers for their good: for if God give them up to obduracy, all efforts to bring them to repentance will be unavailing. Nothing tends more to this judicial obduracy than premeditated injustice, or confidence in our own wisdom, righteousness, and strength, in opposition to the word of God and from enmity to it: and "those who thus walk in pride, the LORD knoweth how to abase," or to destroy.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1—3. The Lord in vision showed Amos the judgments that he was about to bring upon Israel. He appeared to him as forming grasshoppers, or locusts, in order to send them forth to waste the land. It is probable, that the king was used to take a great part of the first mowing of the meadows, for the provender of his horses; so that the cattle of the people chiefly depended on the second growth, and the failure of that supply would have greatly distressed them. The prophet, seeing in his vision this calamity coming on them, and fearing that it would be inflicted in reality, earnestly interceded for his people, that the Lord would forgive their sin, and remit their punishment: for if he thus proceeded against them, by whom could Jacob, or his Church, be recovered from its present enfeebled and desolate condition? This plea, in which the honour of God was so concerned, prevailed; and the Lord remitted, or mitigated, the punishment.—Some suppose this to have been an emblem of the first invasion of the Assyrians, which was not so fatal as might have been expected. After Ahab and his family had reduced Israel to the brink of ruin, they began to revive again under the government of Jehu, his son Joash, and his grandson Jeroboam: yet desolations awaited them from the Assyrians, which would soon begin; but they would be restrained, or retarded, in answer to the prayers of the prophets. (Marg. Ref.) It is probable, that Amos made known to the people these visions, in order, as he received them.

V. 4—6. God next showed the prophet, that he was preparing to contend with Israel by fire; either by excessive heat and drought, or lightning, or the breaking forth of subterraneous fires. This appeared to him to waste, not only the rivers, but the waters of the ocean, as well as to consume a part of the people; which implied, that entire ruin was threatened, and was begun to be inflicted. 10 ¶ Then Amaziah the priest of Beth-el sent to Jeroboam king of Israel, saying, Amos hath conspired against thee in the midst of the house of Israel: the land is not able to bear all his words.

induced the prophet to renew his former plea, and with similar success; and the more tremendous effects of the judgment were prevented. Some understand this of the ravages that Tiglath-pilezer made in the land, which only occasioned temporary and partial calamities, though they threatened entire desolation. (2 Kings xv. 29.)

V. 7-9. The Lord next appeared to Amos upon a wall, that had been formed by a plumb-line: this might represent the Church of Israel, as originally formed according to those rules which God, in infinite wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness, had prescribed by Moses. The plumb-line in his hand implied, that he was examining with exactness how far the people had deviated from their rule and original constitution, being about to judge and punish them according to their sins. This vision seems to have discouraged the prophet's intercession: he saw their idolatries and iniquities to be so many and heinous, and the judgments predicted against them to be so righteous, that he could say nothing to it. But the Lord, having called his strict attention to the vision, showed him that he was about to proceed against Israel in exact justice; that the threatened punishment should not be remitted; that the strong-holds, cities, and idolatrous temples, should be desolated; and that this would begin in the destruction of the family of Jeroboam by the sword of a conspirator. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10, 11. Amaziah, the chief priest, or president over the idolatrous worship at Beth-el, was greatly displeased with Amos for declaring these visions at that place; and especially for the last, which he had not prayed to be averted. Probably he feared lest it should set the people against the worship of the golden calves, undermine his credit and interests, and even alienate them from the established government. He therefore sent word to Jeroboam,

(who seems to have been then at Samaria,) accusing the prophet of having conspired against him, and of exciting the people to revolt and rebellion: so that the land was not able to bear all his words, and would certainly be greatly injured, unless he were silenced and punished. But he offered no proof of this conspiracy, except Amos's predictions of approaching judgments: and in reporting his words he bare false witness against him; for he had not said, that "Jeroboam should die by the sword;" but that the Lord "would rise against his house with the sword," which took place after Jeroboam's death, in the murder of his son Zachariah by Shallum, who succeeded him. (2 Kings xv. 3-12.) He traduces the prophet as a stirrer up of sedition. The same crime was objected to Jeremiah, to Christ, and to St. Paul. (Marg. Ref.) (Louth.)

V. 12, 13. It does not appear that Jeroboam noticed Amaziah's information, either despising the prophet and his predictions, or having a more favourable opinion of him than to suspect him of any bad design. But Amaziah was desirous of driving him away by any means. He therefore ironically called him a seer, or a prophet; but intimated that he only meant to get a livelihood by that employ: and he advised or charged him to flee away from Beth-el into the land of Judah, where he would be more welcome, and fare better than in Israel. He must, however, by no means prophesy any more at Beth-el, which was the king's chapel, where his established worship was conducted and graced with his presence, and where he had a palace and kept his court. It was therefore indecent for him to revile the king's religion, and denounce the judgments of God against him and his family and people, in the very place where his chapel and court were!—"Thou shalt not add to prophesy." V. 15—17. Amos answered Amaziah with great boldness, yet with modesty and propriety. He declared that he had not formerly been a prophet, nor was his father a prophet; nor had he been educated in the schools of the prophets. But he had been a herdman, and a gatherer of a fruit, (a wild fig,) which grew on some kind of sycamore-trees, and was used for food by the poor people, or perhaps for the cattle. In these rural occupations he had been inured to hard labour and homely fare; and he had followed them contentedly, till the Lord, by express revelation, commanded him to go and prophesy to his people. Yet Amaziah, in direct opposition to the divine mandate, forbade his prophesying against Israel, or dropping a word against that people at Beth-el! The prophet was therefore commissioned to denounce sentence against him; that his wife, either through extreme indigence or licentiousness, should become a harlot in the streets of Beth-el; that his children should be slain by the sword of war or of the murderer; that his estate should be divided by line among those who seized on it; that he should die in a heathen land; and that Israel would surely go away into captivity.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The prayers of pious ministers and believers avert many calamities from churches and nations, which would otherwise overwhelm them. They who most faithfully denounce the terrors of the Lord against sinners, should be most earnest in prayers for their repentance and forgiveness. The low estate of the Church, and of any part of it, may be pleaded with God as a reason why he should pardon and spare it; for it is his cause; he would be deprived of his revenue of worship and honour, should it be totally ruined; and none but he can raise Jacob from his low estate, when he is so weak and hath so many and powerful enemies. Our gracious God will for a time regard his people's prayers for their irreligious neighbours and relatives, and defer the execution of deserved punishment; but he will at length examine the cause of every community and individual by the line and standard of his word; and then all the unbelieving and impenitent will be condemned; and even they who have before most pleaded in their behalf, will have no more to say for them.

V. 10—17.

No fervent prayers, or self-denying labours of ministers, can induce proud sinners to bear with their faithful reproofs and warnings. They will be accused of wishing for those miseries, which they warn men to flee from; their opposition to established impieties and iniquities will be construed into disaffection, or rebellion against the king or commonwealth; and their ministry will often be considered as an intolerable grievance. Men in general cannot bear with their alarming and reproving words; but mercenary and ambitious priests, the ringleaders of superstition or idolatry, will be the most inveterate and intolerant. Such have commonly been false accusers of the Lord's servants to princes, and the first movers of persecution: for their reputation, authority, and quiet enjoyment of their preferences, are endangered by the prevalence of truth and righteousness. Sometimes, however, even irreligious or idolatrous princes have not been disposed to listen to their insinuations, or to adopt their counsels; and they have been forced to employ menaces against those whom they would have more imperiously silenced, if they could: or they have given them counsel that savoured of their own character. Such men will perhaps intimate where and how ministers are most likely to obtain preferment or to escape the cross; but not where good may be done to souls. They consider it as the extreme of folly, insolence, or rusticity, to declare alarming offensive truths before the great; or where error, impiety, and vice, are sanctioned by high authority, long established customs, or eminent examples; as if smooth and soothing heresies alone were fit to be prophesied in the chapels of kings, and soft deceitful words alone would pass current in their palaces! And as if it were the enviable prerogative of royalty and privilege of nobility, to tread unmolested and unadmonished the broad road to everlasting misery! Indeed, none should intrude themselves into such places and services: nor are all, that are called to the ministry, qualified to assault iniquity, impiety, infidelity, or superstition, in these strong holds. But when the Lord has work to do of an extraordinary kind, he will raise up and furnish proper instruments for it. In doing this, he often deviates from men's rules, and takes such as have not been regularly educated; but perhaps were engaged in some laborious occupation, where they were inured to hardship, kept at a distance from the luxuries and indulgences of the affluent, and taught indifference to the interests and splendour of the world. They, however, who are selected to these services, must declare the whole word of God, without reserve, or respect of persons, to princes, or people, whatever treatment they may be exposed to: and they who oppose, or attempt to silence them, will do it at their peril. We cannot indeed speak too humbly of ourselves and our poor attainments and services, but as ministers we ought to "magnify our office:" and though we ought not to apply the denunciations or examples of God's word, personally to our opposers; yet we should not hesitate to declare, that they who despise the least of those whom the Lord sends forth to preach his word, are despisers of him; and that all who injure them, may expect severe rebukes, in their families, persons, and circumstances, and even fatal effects to their souls, except they repent. Nor can they prevent any of those judgments, the denunciation of which offends them; whilst their opposition provokes God to contend with them in particular.

7 The Lord hath sworn by the excellency of Jacob, Surely I will never forget any of their works.

10 And I will turn your feasts into mourning, and all your songs into lamentation; and I will bring up a sackcloth upon all loins, and baldness upon every head; and I will make it as the mourning of an only son, and the end thereof as a bitter day.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1—3. Under the emblem of a basket of summer fruit, which must be used immediately or it will perish, the speedy approach of the predicted judgments upon Israel was denoted, for which they were fully ripe. This may be supposed to have begun in the murder of Zachariah the son of Jeroboam: as the subsequent contests, between the successive usurpers of the throne, made way for the Assyrian invasions, which terminated in the entire ruin of the kingdom of Israel. These approaching events would turn the songs that were used in the temple of Bethel, &c. or those of their idol-temples, or in the palace, into howlings of terror and despair. Numbers would die in every place by the sword, pestilence, and famine, whose bodies the survivors would cast forth without the customary solemnities of burial; as hardened in grief and regardless of their nearest friends, and relatives, through anxious concern for their own safety.

V. 4—10. The rich and powerful were exceedingly addicted to injustice and oppression, as well as ringleaders in impiety and idolatry: and the approaching calamities would fall more heavily on them than on others. They ought therefore to consider how they might escape, or how they could endure such miseries; instead of oppressing the poor, as if they would devour and extirpate them by their exactions. It seems, that commerce was suspended, even in Israel, on the new moons and sabbath-days, which they observed with some forms of devotion: but this was a weariness; and the covetous oppressors were ready to say to themselves, and to each other, 'When will this tedious day be over? When will this task of religion be done?' They wanted to return to worldly pursuits: they were in haste to set forth corn to sale, in order to increase their riches. In managing this traffic, which so nearly concerned the labouring poor, they made the ephah, or bushel, too small, and thus cheated in the quantity of what they sold; and they weighed the silver, with which they were paid, by too heavy a weight, and thus cheated in the sum which they took for it; nay, they used artifice in the act of weighing, and imposed in that way also on their customers; and they even took advantage of the people's necessities, to sell the refuse corn, which was scarcely fit for use. By these methods the poor became their debtors, and they obtained permission to sell them for slaves; which they inhumanly took advantage of, when they gained but a very trivial sum by depriving them of liberty; (ii. 6.) But the Lord swore by himself, who was the real excellency, or most honourable distinction, of his people, that he would never forget or omit to punish any of their works. These crimes would provoke him to send upon them such judgments as would make the land to tremble, as in an earthquake: it would be desolated by overwhelming calamities from one end to another, as Egypt is annually covered by an inundation of the Nile: their prosperity and hopeful prospects would be suddenly darkened, as if the sun should go down at noon-day, and the clear light should be exchanged for midnight darkness: their idolatrous or sensual feasts, and the songs accompanying them, would

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1-4. The altar, from which the prophet in vision saw the Lord standing and giving orders for the destruction of the temple and the worshippers, is generally understood of the altar at Bethel : for the sacrifices offered there to the golden calf chiefly provoked God to take vengeance on Israel. He therefore from thence commissioned the Assyrians to smite the lintel of the door, and cause its posts and pillars to shake ; to destroy that temple, and put an end to that idolatry ; and mortally to wound the king, princes, priests, and people, who worshipped there ; for he was determined to slay the last of them by the sword of his vengeance, from which there should be no method of escape. But as the vision seems to coincide with some predictions of the Lord's departure from the temple at Jerusalem ; (Notes, Ez. viii. ix. x. xi.) so it may be questioned, whether that event were not also intended by the spirit of prophecy. The devoted objects, however, of the divine indignation, would find no place of refuge from their omnipresent and omnipotent Avenger. Could they even dig to the centre of the earth, or descend to the place of condemned spirits, his hand would there arrest them : could they climb up into heaven, his arm would cast them down : should they hide themselves in the rocks, at the summit of mount Carmel, he would search them out, and drag them from their recesses : or should they endeavour to elude his search by diving to the bottom of the ocean, he would order the serpent, or some destructive sea-monster, to bite or devour them there. The executioners of his vengeance would pursue them into every place whither they fled from them : and even the remnant, that would be dispersed as captives and slaves in the land of their enemies, would be followed by the murdering sword ; as the Lord would watch over them for evil, and not for good. The contrast between hell and heaven, (2) shows that the unseen world, and not the grave, is here meant. (Note, Ps. xvi. 8-11.)

V. 5, 6. (Marg. Ref.) The eternal almighty God would even cause the land to melt like wax at his touch ; and all the inhabitants to mourn, because of the wide spreading calamities that would follow. For it was he that formed and occupied the heavens as his chambers, or exalted throne ; who hath appointed the creatures of this lower world as a troop of his armies, to annoy his enemies ; and who can, at his pleasure, bring all the waters of the ocean to cover the whole earth. 'The power and sure vengeance of the deity are very sublimely described in this and the four preceding verses.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 7-10. 'Are ye not under a curse, as the Ethiopians, the posterity of Ham, were, by reason of your multiplied sins and apostasies ?' (Louth.) (Notes, Gen. ix. 24, 25. x. 6, 7.) 'The sense seems to be, Trust not believers, through the abundant influences of the Holy Ghost upon their souls. Then the Lord will bring again the captivity of his people, and they will be planted and prosper in their own land, and will no more be pulled up out of it. This cannot be interpreted of the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity; for they were afterwards driven out of their land by the Romans, and continue excluded from it to this day; so that the future conversion of the Jews, and their restoration to their own land, and the security and felicity of the Church in times to come, must be here predicted. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Hypocrisy and obstinate preference of human inventions to God's appointments, render men's religious observance their most heinous and ruinous crimes. Wherever ungodly men flee to hide themselves, they meet the frown and vengeance of their offended Sovereign, which would suffice to turn a local heaven into a real hell. Wretched then must they be, on whom the Lord sets his eyes for evil, and not for good; for all creatures are ready at his command to pursue and fight against his enemies. When professed Christians copy the crimes of infidels or idolaters, they become still more abominable in the sight of God; and no external advantages or favours can prove us the objects of his special love. Whilst he watches over sinful kingdoms, to destroy them, he will not fail to preserve his Church.

His servants may be scattered, persecuted, tempted, and harassed in a variety of ways; but not one of them shall be lost: for the least true believer shall infallibly be taken care of, through all the revolutions of nations, in the hour of death, and amidst the convulsions of expiring nature: but the tares will be gathered from amidst the wheat, and cast into the fire to be burned; and then hypocrites will know the truths of those threatenings which they here presumptuously despised. Blessed be God, we live in the days when the kingdom of David is set up, in the Person of his Son, the divine Redeemer, and we Gentiles are become his possession and are called by his name: let us be thankful for our privileges, and endeavour to walk worthy of them. Yet we still witness many breaches in the tabernacle of our King: many divisions, abuses, and scandals, yet deform the Church; the power of godliness is declined in many parts of it, and others are harassed by oppressions and persecutions; and a great part of mankind yet continue strangers and enemies to the Gospel: we should therefore continue in prayer for the complete performance of these predictions, in the more perfect peace, purity, and beauty of the Church; in the increase of diligent, able, faithful, and successful ministers; in the ruin of all obstinate enemies; and in the conversion of Jews, Gentiles, and Mahometans, to the faith of Christ. But only in heaven shall we be so planted and established, as to experience no more changes, fears, temptations, sins, or sorrows; for there alone is fulness of joy for evermore.

BOOK OF OBADIAH.

It is probable, that Obadiah delivered this short prophecy about the time when Jerusalem was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar.—Obadiah signifies the servant of the Lord, which was a common name in Israel: but the prophet must be distinguished from all others that bare it.—He seems to have been contemporary with Jeremiah, and uses several of his expressions in prophesying against Edom, (Jer. xlix. 7—22;) and he concludes, (as almost all the other prophets do,) with predicting victory and prosperity to Israel and to the Church.

A prediction of the ruin of Edom for his pride, and his malice against the descendants of his brother Jacob, i—10. Promises of glorious times, in the latter ages, 17—21.

THE vision of Obadiah. Thus saith the Lord GOD^a concerning Edom: ^bWe have heard a rumour from the LORD^c, and an ambassador is sent among the heathen, ^dArise ye, and let us rise up against her in battle.

2 Behold, ^eI have made thee small among the heathen: thou art greatly despised.

3 The ^fpride of thine heart hath de-

4 Though thou ^bexalt thyself^c as the eagle, and though thou set thy nest ^damong the stars, thence will I bring thee down, saith the LORD.

5 If thieves came to thee, ^eif robbers by night, (^fhow art thou cut off!) would they not have stolen till they had enough? ^gif the grape-gatherers came to thee, would they not leave ^hsome grapes?

NOTES.

V. 1, 2. Obadiah might be employed to deliver verbal messages to his people on other occasions; but this vision alone was preserved for the benefit of future generations.—The prophets had heard a report from the Lord, that ruin was preparing for the insulting enemies of the Jews; and ambassadors were sent about among the nations, to excite each other to war against the Edomites; by which means the Lord would shortly make them small and despised among their neighbours. (Note, Jer. xlix. 14, 15.)

V. 3—6. (Notes, Jer. xlix. 9, 10, 16.) The Edomites inhabited a mountainous country, which they had strongly fortified: they had for some time been prospered, and they proudly confided in their strength and munitions, and concluded that no enemy could prevail against them. But the Lord was become their adversary; and even if they could exalt themselves as much above their other enemies as the stars are out of the reach of man, or like the eagle which builds her nests in the loftiest cedars, yet the Lord would certainly bring them down, and their pride would only help to deceive and ruin them. With astonishment the prophet saw, as it were, their hostile invaders not only making depredations and slaughter, and then departing, but cutting off all their multitudes, and ransacking their most secret treasures, till they had plundered the whole of them:

V. 15, 16. Israel and Judah had experienced a day of the Lord's righteous judgment on them for their sins, by the hands of the Assyrians and Chaldeans; whilst the Gentiles seemed to escape with impunity, and to prosper in their wickedness; but the day of the Lord was at hand, in which he would judge all those nations that had injured his people, and retaliate their oppressions upon them. The Jews had drunk the cup of God's indignation, even on mount Zion; and the Heathen should drink continually and abundantly of the same cup, until they were utterly destroyed. The ruin of the several nations, that bordered or had fought against Israel, was predicted; but they were types of the enemies of the Christian Church, who will be utterly destroyed in due season. (Notes, Ez. xxxiv. lxxiii. 1-6.) The prophet speaks of the Jews here as already under a state of captivity; as they actually were before this prophecy was fulfilled. (Lowth.)

V. 17—21. When this prophecy was delivered, mount Zion either lay desolate, or was about immediately to be desolated, while the enemies of the Jews had dominion over them. "But upon mount Zion shall be those that "escape," or (an escaping;) "and it shall be holy," (Bp. Newcombe.) Thus it was foretold, that there would be deliverance and holiness at Jerusalem, and the house of Jacob would again occupy their ancient possessions. Then Israel and Judah would become as a flame, to consume the Edomites as stubble, till they were utterly destroyed: and the remnant of the people, that were at that time captives, would not only possess the land of Canaan, but the adjoining districts; which they would take out of the hands of those who now oppressed them.—The remaining tribes would possess the country which had belonged to those who continued in their dispersions, to the utmost borders of the promised land, and even beyond them. Thus Judah would possess mount Seir, to the south; and another company the land of the Philistines, towards the west; and others would recover possession of mount Ephraim and Samaria, though at that time possessed by strangers. Benjamin would inherit Gilead, beyond Jordan, which the Ammonites had seized on: and the residue of the ten tribes would gain possession of all the country formerly inhabited by the Canaanites, even to Zarephath, or Sarepta, which bordered on Zidon. It is not agreed, what is meant by Sepharad; but some think that it was the name of a city in Edom, which the remnant of those who were led captive from Jerusalem would possess, with the cities of the south. For saviours, or deliverers, would be raised up on mount Zion, to judge and execute vengeance on the Edomite; and the kingdom, or dominion, would actually be possessed and exercised by JEHOVAH, for the benefit of his worshippers. This prophecy was accomplished, when the Jews returned to their own land by Cyrus's decree; when the temple was rebuilt, and the worship of God restored; when Jerusalem was re-established in prosperity, and the land replenished with inhabitants; when the Jews, under the Maccabees and other leaders, entirely subjugated the Edomites, and incorporated the remnant of them amongst themselves as proselytes; and in their subsequent prosperity, till the days of Christ. No mention is made of the Philistines by Christ or his apostles. They seem, before that time, to have been extirpated from the land. But the salvation and holiness of the Gospel, its success and spread, by the faithful preaching of the word, and the conversion of the Gentiles, were also intended; especially the future restoration of the Jews, the destruction of antichristian opposers, and that prosperous state of the Church, to which all the prophets evidently bear witness. Then, and not till then, in the full sense of the words, shall "the kingdom be the "LORD'S."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The Lord exalts, or abases, and renders nations honourable, or contemptible, as he sees good. Self-confidence, reliance on external advantages, ambitious projects, and carnal security, uniformly tend to calamity and contempt; and thus the pride of men's hearts deceives them. No exaltation or power can secure those whom God is concerned in honour to bring down. Renowned warriors are generally the most rapacious and insatiable of all thieves and robbers: the prosperity of others only excites their appetite for plunder; and so riches tend to the ruin of their possessors. They who rely on plausible and mercenary helpers, are deficient in understanding: for there is so much treachery in man, that such persons commonly give their confederates the most fatal wounds. They only are happy who trust in the Lord; for in the day of his displeasure, he destroys the wisdom of the prudent, and mars the courage of the mighty, that all his enemies may receive deserved punishment.

V. 10—21.

God will surely confound those who oppress their brethren of the same nature with themselves; and those especially who hate such as the Lord loves, and afflict them because they belong to him. They who rejoice in the calamities which others inflict will be numbered among oppressors; and all that would escape their doom must take care not to sanction their cruelties by their presence, or approbation. It is criminal to behold with the least degree of satisfaction, or even without deep concern, the distresses of our neighbours; and still more so to insult over them under their calamities. If we cannot enter the doors of the oppressed and afflicted to sympathize with them, and to soothe or relieve their sorrows, we had better keep at a distance, lest we should increase, or appear to take pleasure in, their misery. How base then must they be, who seize on such opportunities to lay hands on the property of their neighbours, or to wreak their revenge or satiate their cruelty, by giving assistance to the principal actors in such bloody tragedies! But let both the sorrowful believer and the insolent oppressor know, that the day of the Lord is near upon all the heathen: that the injuries which the persecuted have endured will be recompensed upon their persecutors, who will drink of that cup, which they have been instrumental in putting into the hands of others; and that the troubles of the righteous will soon be over, but those of the wicked will be eternal and complete. Happy then is the inhabitant of Zion, even in the most afflicted times: there alone is deliverance from the wrath to come and from every evil; there holiness is communicated and resides: and whilst the Lord purifies his redeemed "from all their iniquities, to be unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works," he both marks them out as his own, and prepares them to possess their purchased inheritance. His people will also be victorious, and as a flame to consume their enemies; and they shall inherit all things, whilst others shall lose even what they seemed to have. Blessed be God, for the divine

Saviour and Judge on mount Zion; and for those whom he sends forth as instruments of bringing sinners to partake of his salvation! May all employed in this work be faithful and successful! so that their word may be a savour of life unto life to numbers, and a savour of death unto death to all that reject it, as judging and condemning obstinate unbelievers; and in both respects a sweet savour to the Lord, whose is "the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever, Amen."

THE BOOK OF JONAH.

Jonah was no doubt more ancient than any of those prophets, whose writings are preserved in this part of the sacred Scripture.—He predicted the successes of Jeroboam, the son of Joash; (2 Kings xiv. 25;) and it is probable that the prophecy was delivered a considerable time before its accomplishment. Some think, that Jonah executed his prophetic office as early as the latter part of Jehu's reign: and it is not agreed whether the events recorded in this book, occurred at his entrance on that office, or at a later period.—Nothing more is known of him, except that he was of Gath-hepher, a town in the tribe of Zebulun, (Josh. xix. 13: Gittath-hepher;) and the traditions extant concerning him are unworthy of the least notice.—The book before us is rather a narrative than a prophecy. Several of the events recorded in it are of a very extraordinary nature; which has induced some to explain it as an allegory, and emboldened others profanely to ridicule it. But it should be remembered, that our Lord himself hath repeatedly attested the truth of the narrative, and shown, that the most wonderful event in it was intended as a type or emblem of his own death, burial, and resurrection on the third day. (Matt. xii. 39—41. xvi. 4. Luke xi. 32.) The knowledge of "the power of God," as manifested by the Scriptures, will fully satisfy the humble mind respecting the miracles here recorded: and a deep knowledge of our own hearts will abate our astonishment at the extraordinary conduct of the prophet himself. 'The fame of Jonah's deliverance' appears to have spread among the heathen nations: and the Greeks, who were accustomed to adorn the memory of their heroes, by every remarkable event and embellishment which they could appropriate, afterwards added to the fictitious adventures of Hercules, that of having continued three days without injury in the belly of a dog, sent against him by Neptune. The fable of Arion and the Dolphin, of which the date is fixed at a time nearly coeval with the period of Jonah, is possibly a misrepresentation of particulars recorded in this sacred book.' (Gray's Key.) Jonah lived almost as early as the most ancient of the Greek poets. His impartiality in recording his own sins, is peculiar to the sacred writers.

V. 2, 3. Nineveh, the capital of the Assyrian empire, was one of the largest cities that we read of; being thirty miles in circumference, if historians may be credited. Other prophets foretold the destruction of heathen cities for their crimes: but Jonah was ordered to go to Nineveh, that he might, on the spot, denounce the judgments of God against it. Some think, that he declined this service, because he was jealous for the honour of Israel, and was not willing that the Gentiles should partake of the benefits of prophecy; and he afterwards intimates, that he apprehended God would mercifully spare Nineveh, and that he should be despised and punished as a false prophet. (Note, iv. 3, 2.) But when we consider the perils and hardships, to which this journey and service were likely to expose him; when we imagine to ourselves the probable reception of a despised prophet of Israel in this proud idolatrous city, come awedly to predict its speedy destruction; and that this might draw upon him the resentment both of the rulers and the multitude; when we reflect how such a message would be received in the streets of London at this day; we shall not wonder, that he was extremely reluctant to undertake the business. Strong faith, and a habit of unreserved obedience, were necessary, to overcome the reluctance that Jonah must have felt: and perhaps he was a young man, and not as yet inured to perilous services. He seems to have supposed that the Spirit of prophecy would not rest on him, if he left the land of Israel to go some other way than to Nineveh; he desired to be freed from those impulses, with which he had not courage and faith to comply; and he therefore purposed ^{to} flee unto Tarshish from the ^{presence} of the LORD. Accordingly he went to Joppa, a sea-port town, said to be about forty miles from Gath-hepher, where he is supposed to have dwelt, and in the opposite direction from Nineveh. There he met with a vessel about to sail to Tarshish, and paying the fare went aboard; as if he thought that now he should be removed to a distance from the immediate presence of God, and as not expecting to be pursued by a more imminent danger than any of those from which he fled.

Tarshish. Bochart says, that there were two places of this name; one, Tartessus in Spain—near the pillars of Hercules; the other in the Indian Ocean, near Ophir, — which island is thought to be the modern Ceylon. To ^{this} latter men sailed from Ezion-geber on the Red Sea. (By. Newcombe.) Some versions, however, and expositors, suppose Tarsus in Cilicia to be here meant.

V. 4—6. During the time which was occupied in this rebellious project, Jonah seems to have received no more impulses of the prophetic Spirit; but to have been left to great insensibility of conscience. A storm of wind was therefore commissioned to arrest the ship, and it was in the utmost danger of being wrecked. It seems that the tempest was of an extraordinary nature. The affrighted mariners, therefore, having some sense of a superior power, but no right knowledge of the true God, and being, of different countries, cried every one to the idol that he had been used to worship, for deliverance from death: at the same time they cast overboard their merchandise, or tackling, to lighten the ship and preserve it from sinking. Yet during all this confusion and hurry, Jonah lay asleep below deck, and heard nothing of the matter; having perhaps had little sleep for some time, through fatigue and uneasiness. This caused the ship-master to address him as a very stupid and indolent person, and to reprove him for sleeping, when all their lives were in such imminent peril; and to require him to arise, and call upon the God he had been used to worship, if so be he might be induced to regard, compassionate, and deliver them. Thus he who, as the messenger of JEHOVAH, ought to have been reproving the Ninevites, received a just and severe rebuke from an idolatrous mariner!

V. 7. The extraordinary nature of this tempest; and the general notions of a superior power, and of right and wrong, which these men entertained, induced them to conclude, that some atrocious criminal sailed with them, for whose cause this evil had befallen them. According therefore to the custom both of the Gentiles, and also of the Lord's worshippers, they agreed to decide, by casting lots, who the criminal was; this was an appeal to the heart-searching God and his providence; and he was pleased to determine the matter for them, by causing the lot to fall upon Jonah. (Herg. Ref.) ^{This} was an usual method of referring things to the appointment, or discovery, of Providence. (Louth.)

V. 8—10. When Jonah was thus singled out as the culprit whom divine vengeance pursued, the mariners did not proceed against him with violence, as might have been expected, considering their loss and extreme danger: but, perhaps, perceiving something grave and serious in his demeanour, they calmly entreated him to inform them, whether he were not conscious of some great crime, for which this calamity was come upon them? And whether he could deny that it was on his account? They wanted to know what his employment was? whether lawful or not? Whether he were not now upon some criminal project, or fleeing from justice? and in short, who he was, and of what country, &c.? Accordingly, he without reserve informed them of his people and religion, as a worshipper of JEHOVAH the God of heaven, the Creator both of the sea and the dry land; and ingenuously confessed his heinous sin. This exceedingly alarmed them, either as it showed them the power of that God who was contending with them, and whom they knew not how to appease; or because they were in doubt how to behave towards his prophet, perceiving great danger, whether they retained him in the ship, or cast him over-board. They, however, remonstrated with Jonah for rebelling against the command, and attempting to flee from the presence of the great Creator; and for involving them as well as himself in such imminent danger.

V. 11—16. The mariners, perceiving that the tempest continued to increase, and not knowing how to act, inquired of Jonah himself, as JEHOVAH's prophet, What they ought to do in this emergency? And he, convinced of his sin and folly, submitting to the justice of God, and expecting death for his crime, and perhaps receiving some intimation of the divine will, counselled them to cast him into the sea; and thus the tempest would cease, for he knew that it was raised on his account. He would not, however, cast himself over-board, for that would have been an act of suicide. But the men, probably affected by the candid confession and the disinterested conduct of Jonah, and fearing to lay hands on the Lord's servant, used every effort to get into port; that putting him on shore, they might preserve his life and their own also. When they found their endeavours to be in vain, (as "the sea grew more and more tempestuous;" Marg.) they prayed (not every one to his god as before, but to JEHOVAH, entreating him that they might not perish for taking away Jonah's life, nor be deemed guilty of murdering the innocent; as his sovereign appointment had laid them under the necessity of doing this for their own preservation. After this appeal, they cast Jonah over-board: and as the storm immediately ceased, they were so impressed with what they had seen and heard, that they exceedingly feared the power and revered the authority of JEHOVAH, and worshipped his name; and either at that time, or as soon as they could, they offered to him sacrifices of thanksgiving for their deliverance, and made vows of becoming his servants and worshippers. We may conclude, that some of them at least were savingly converted, by means of these extraordinary transactions. — "Disclaiming all their idol-gods, they offered a sacrifice to the only true God, and made vows to him, (which they would certainly perform upon their return,) to worship him at Jerusalem." (Bp. Hall.)

V. 17. As it was the will of God to chastise Jonah, but not to cut him off; he had prepared a great fish near the ship to receive him into its stomach. Christ hath called it a whale, (Κετος) and repeatedly authenticated the whole narration; and probably some of that species have throats wide enough to swallow a man, though others may not. (Marg. Ref.) The whole affair was miraculous: the preservation of Jonah from suffocation in the belly of the whale could only be effected by a continued exertion of almighty power; and the most daring infidel will scarcely venture to say, that God could not prepare such a great fish for this purpose, and effect Jonah's deliverance in such a manner. In this situation Jonah remained for three days and three nights; at least, (according to the Hebrew phraseology) one whole day and night and a part of two others. In this he was a type of Christ, as dead and buried, and rising again on the third day. 'The precise time was thus determined, to prefigure the period of our Lord's continuance in the grave.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

They who serve God in the work of the ministry, must prepare for unreserved obedience amidst manifold hardships and dangers; and should arm themselves with faith and patience, and a spirit of self denial. They must arise and go to every place, whither Providence calls them; and not spare to reprove the sins of the great or of the many, or to denounce against them the judgments of that God, before whom their crimes have been committed.—Unbelief and the fear of man start a thousand objections to such services; and even pious men are capable of most absurd notions and most extravagant actions, when desirous of escaping the cross, or declining obedience in perilous circumstances: nay, like Adam, they may be tempted to hide themselves from the presence of the Lord by flight, or by running among the trees of the garden! Thus some awakened sinners have removed from the places, preachers, or companions, that have disquieted them, in hopes of being again easy in their beloved sinful course of life: and thus even pious ministers, when greatly opposed or discouraged, are apt to wish for removals to some other place, and to think they could do better any where, or in any situation, than that assigned them by their Lord and Master! But there is always more danger in disobeying, than in obeying God: he can arrest his fugitives by storms from without or from within; and nothing but shame and distress can come on those who run away from their proper place and work. Sin and temptation may render even a believer, for a time, more insensible than the most ignorant heathen! In imminent danger, when natural conscience extorts from the latter a cry of distress to an imaginary or unknown god, and induces them to part with their possessions in hopes of saving their lives, the former may remain secure and asleep, without any sense of guilt or fear of wrath. But the Lord will rebuke and chasten those whom he loves; and the persons whom he sometimes employs for this purpose, serve to cover his offending servants with shame, and to fill them with anguish.—Surely the people of the world in general may be thus addressed. 'Shall men part with all their substance, to save their lives? And will they not renounce worldly interests and pleasures, to save their souls? What do men mean by sleeping on in sin, when the word of God and the convictions of their consciences warn them to arise and call upon the LORD, if they would escape everlasting misery?' And do we not all need such reproofs on some occasions? What do we mean, amidst all our fears, temptations, difficulties, and perils, and those of the church or the community, to be so supine and heartless? Should we not admonish each other to awake, and arise, and call upon our God; if so be he would think upon and deliver us?

V. 11—17.

In great distresses it behooves us to inquire, on what account and for whose cause the evil is come upon us! And though it may not be deemed expedient to use the lot, amidst the abuse and profanation of it that prevails, yet we may appeal to the Lord in prayer; and by his word and Spirit, and in his providence, he can readily show us the cause and remedy of all our troubles. They who rebel against God, often occasion great calamities to those with whom they associate; yet they should not be treated with harshness or virulence; and careful inquiry should always precede the due punishment of culprits. When the true believer has been betrayed into sin, and is evidently become the criminal cause of harm to others; and when he is brought to a proper sense of his misconduct; he will frankly confess his guilt, and speak honourably of God, though to his own shame and condemnation: and indeed it may justly cause the profligate and profane to tremble, when they consider with what marked severity the Lord often punishes the transgressions of his worshippers. In such circumstances they will condemn themselves, and submit patiently to any temporal punishment, if so be they can hope to be delivered from the wrath to come: nay, they will rather choose chastisement in their own persons, than to become the occasions of ruin to others. (2 Sam. xxiv. 17.) Such behaviour will sometimes win upon the ungodly, when they cannot but see their criminality, and are suffering in consequence of it: and it is proper to do all we can to save the lives even of those who have greatly offended; for the natural conscience has a horror at the thoughts of wilful murder. When necessity constrains men to take away life, it should be done with extreme reluctance, and only in order to preservation from death, or for other important ends. And it ought not to be done, if it can be avoided by any tolerable loss or hardship; for the persons concerned should be able humbly to appeal to God that they could not avoid the painful expedient, and be confident that innocent blood will not be laid to their charge. When the cause of evil is removed, the effect will commonly cease; and the renunciation of sinful pleasures or interests makes way for a sweet sense of the pardoning love of God. His servants will scarcely ever be entirely useless; he often takes occasion, even from our sins and follies, to promote the glory of his name and the salvation of souls: and if men's lives be endangered and their property diminished, through their acquaintance with his worshippers, yet, if their discourse or example bring any to fear, trust, worship, and obey God, their gain will be great. Surely the conduct of these heathen mariners will rise up in judgment against numbers of those that are called Christians, who neither offer prayers in their distresses, nor sacrifices of thanksgiving for their most signal deliverances! The Lord will humble, but he will not destroy, his offending servants: and he can preserve, or punish, in numberless ways, of which we have no conception. But let us not overlook Him, who gave himself up to death, to rescue us from the wrath of God: the storm that he suffered to appease, was wholly of our raising; and he died, was buried, and on the third day rose again, to sanctify death and the grave to his people, and to be the first-fruits of their resurrection to everlasting life and glory.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. Jonah was brought into such a situation as no man ever was in before or since: yet his life was not only preserved, but he was enabled to exercise his reason, and to collect his thoughts for prayer! He was reduced to this condition of extreme misery and peril, by the righteous judgment of God; he could not possibly be delivered, except by miracle; he must be oppressed with guilt and terror; yet he still hoped in God's mercy, and ventured to call upon him. His confinement, his guilt, and the state of his mind, rendered his situation as the belly of hell, or the state of the dead, where there is no hope, and whence there is no escape: yet even thence he cried unto the Lord, and was heard and delivered. Then ^c Jonah spent that time in his earnest prayers to God, and ^d in his humble and hearty confessions of his sin: and ^e after, when he was by the power of God delivered, ^f he penned this song of thanksgiving for so wonderful a mercy. (Bp. Hall.) ^g Those devout thoughts, which ^h he had at that time, he afterward digested into the following prayer; and added a thanksgiving for his deliverance to the end of it. So several of David's Psalms were probably composed after his trouble was over; but suitable to the thoughts he had at the time of his affliction, and with a grateful sense of God's mercies for his deliverance. (Louth.) ⁱ Being now swallowed up of death, and seeing no remedy to escape, his faith burst ^j out unto the Lord; knowing that from the very hell he was able to deliver him.^k

V. 3, 4. The Lord had not only permitted and directed, but he had even constrained, the mariners to cast Jonah into the sea: so that he recognized the hand of God, and submitted to his justice in that dispensation. He was compassed about with floods of waters in the great deep;

whilst all the waves and billows passed over him. He had attempted to flee from the presence of the Lord; and now he feared that he was cast out of his sight: yet he would not quite despair, but would still look to God for help, with a believing regard to his holy temple, the sacrifices there offered, and the mercy-seat, from which he communed with his people: he would still pray for forgiveness, and hope to be permitted again to go up to the temple, or at least to be admitted into the sanctuary above, if he died in his present situation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5-7. When Jonah was cast into the sea, the waters surrounded him, even to the soul or life, or so as to reduce him to the condition of a dying man: the seaweeds were wrapped about his head, either before the fish swallowed him, or being sucked in with the water into its stomach. And thus he was carried to the bottom of the sea, and to the deep rooted bases of those mountains that formed the shore; and he seemed as effectually precluded from all hope of deliverance, as if he had been buried in the centre of the earth, and her perpetual rocks and hills had been the barriers of his tomb: yet from this pit of corruption the Lord brought him forth alive! Thus the Lord Jesus, having endured the wrath of the Father due to our sins, was laid in a new sepulchre hewn out of a rock, closed with a large stone, sealed, and guarded by Roman soldiers: yet from that pit of corruption he was brought forth alive by the power of God, without having seen corruption. When Jonah's heart fainted through terror and distress, he remembered the Lord, and his power, mercy, and truth; his prayer was heard in heaven and accepted; and thus he was delivered.

V. 8, 9. Jonah had been severely corrected; yet he was fully sensible how much better it was to worship God than to regard the idols of the heathen; or any of the superstitions that then prevailed. These were all deceitful vanities; in forsaking the Lord to observe them, men forsook their own mercies and privileges; and they were equally deluded, who sought safety and peace by disobeying God, as Jonah had done. He was now convinced of his folly; and was determined, if he should be delivered, that he would present his sacrifice of praise, with thankful acknowledgment of God's mercies, and pay the vows that he had made in his distress; for salvation, temporal, spiritual, and eternal, were from the Lord alone. This may be considered as his language after his deliverance; and some think that he vowed when in the fish's belly, that in case he was spared he would readily go to Nineveh, according as he had been commanded.

V. 10. Or "The LORD had spoken, &c.?" He so over-ruled this monster of the deep, that it was influenced to get near the shore, and disgorge its prey alive upon the dry land; probably not far from the place where Jonah had embarked. Thus death and the grave were commanded to restore the body of the crucified Redeemer.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We cannot be in any place where we are excluded from the mercy-seat of God; and sharp afflictions are often sent to excite those to earnest cries for mercy, who were negligent in prosperity, and under the rebukes of his word.—Even believers may be reduced by sin, fear, temptation, affliction, and a sense of divine wrath, to a situation that bears some resemblance to the depths of hell: but their discouragements will differ from despair, in that they will never totally cease to seek help from God; and faith and hope will still struggle against the gloomy suggestions of unbelief. The hand of God should be acknowledged in all our troubles: a proper estimate should be formed of the greatness of our difficulties, and the urgency of our distresses; in order that our faith may be fixed more simply upon the power of the Lord for deliverance, and that afterwards we may be duly sensible of our obligations: and we should endeavour to attain to a proper sense of the greatness of our guilt, that we may more value his mercy and salvation. When we have been rescued from pressing difficulties, we should call to remembrance our fears and sorrows, and the weakness and wavering of our faith and hope: that we may be the more affected with the loving-kindness of the Lord in hearing our supplications; and that we may offer the sacrifices of thanksgiving, and pay our vows with greater alacrity and zeal. Our case can never be desperate, whilst we are out of hell: but, as far as a believer is tempted to copy those that "observe lying

"vanities," he forsakes his own mercy, and lives below his privilege. For it is our happiness, that we may worship and hope in God, who is able and willing to save all that call upon him, from sin and its eternal consequences, and from its temporal and painful effects, as far as it is good for them: yea, "he is able to do exceeding abundantly, above all that we ask or think." Amidst all our varying experiences and the changing scenes of life, we should keep the eye of faith fixed upon our once suffering and dying, but now risen and ascended Redeemer. All the waves and billows of the wrath of the Father, due to our sins, went over him; the floods of ungodly men compassed him, the powers of darkness assailed him, death seemed to prevail against him, the grave was opened to receive his body, and his soul departed into the place of separate spirits: but he was again brought alive out of the pit of corruption, that through him the salvation of the Lord might be communicated to all believers. Let us then humbly confess our sins; consider his resurrection as the first-fruits of our own; and thankfully receive every temporal and spiritual deliverance, as the beginning and pledge of our eternal redemption.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—4. It was proper that Jonah should have his commission renewed, before he resumed his office, after his late perverse disobedience; and that he should prove the sincerity of his repentance by performing that service which before he had declined. He was therefore commanded to go and preach to Nineveh the preaching that God commanded him; and he promptly obeyed, without regard to consequences. Nineveh was so large a city, that it would take a man three days to walk round it, or to go into all the principal streets of it. When Jonah therefore came thither, and had entered into the city, he made one day's journey about it, proclaiming as the herald of JEHOVAH, that within forty days Nineveh would be overthrown, by some sudden judgment, such as had befallen Sodom. This respite and warning intimated that there was a reserved condition of mercy, in case they repented; and probably the proclamation was attended with proofs of their most notorious sins. In his progress he met with no interruption; and it is probable that his first day's preaching produced such effects, as rendered it unnecessary for him to proceed any further. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5-9, ' Without question, a sense of their own guilt, and their deserving whatever punishment heaven should inflict, was a principal reason that moved them to have regard to his message. And by the men of Nineveh repenting, at the preaching of Jonah, God designed to upbraid the stubbornness of his own people, and shame them, as it were, into repentance, lest the men of Nineveh should rise up in judgment against them.' (Lowth.) Some think that Paul was king of Nineveh at this time; but it is probable that these events occurred before his days. There were no outward indications of the overthrow of Nineveh, and Jonah wrought no miracle in confirmation of his prediction: yet the Ninevites believed it to be the word of God, and that it would be verified; probably through a conviction excited in their minds of the greatness of their guilt, and from a recollection of the many wonderful judgments that Israel's God had inflicted on his enemies. Perhaps they had also heard of the wonderful things, which God had wrought in respect to Jonah. They therefore dreaded the threatened vengeance, yet had some hope of escaping it; and without delay they used every means which they could devise, in order to appease the wrath of God. For when the preaching of Jonah was made known to the king, he was so alarmed, that he laid aside all his ensigns of royalty, put on sackcloth, and sat among ashes: and, with the concurrence of his nobles and the approbation of his subjects, he ordered a fast to be proclaimed and observed with the greatest strictness. Not only were the people required to abstain wholly from food, but the very cattle were to be kept from all provender and water, that their mournful lowings might add to the solemnity of the awful occasion. All the inhabitants, likewise, from the least to the greatest, were commanded to wear sackcloth; nay, the very cattle that appeared in the streets were thus covered, instead of wearing their former gaudy trappings; while the inhabitants as with one voice all united in most earnest prayers to the God of Israel, to have mercy on them, and spare the city: at the same time they were required to repent, and forsake all their sins, but especially their violence, oppression, and injustice. The proclamation of approaching destruction had not been attended with any express call to repentance, or promises of mercy: yet they proceeded upon this general encouragement, from their apprehensions of the goodness of the Lord, that they could not tell but he might be induced to remit their punishment; or (speaking after the manner of men) to change his mind and repent of his purpose; his vehement anger being appeased by their submissions, humiliations, and supplications; at least this was the most probable way of escaping destruction.

 V. 10. We may conclude that this fast was observed, in a very strict and solemn manner, in all parts of Nineveh; that many fervent prayers were presented to the Lord, and his name greatly honoured, and the idols disparaged; that a general reformation took place, and that numbers were converted to the true God, and his spiritual worship and service. These things the Lord observed and approved, especially their turning from their evil ways; and therefore "he repented of the evil that he had said he would do to them." He did not execute his threatened vengeance; his warning having had its intended effect; for it was his secret purpose to manifest his readiness to forgive, to glorify his mercy, to shame the impenitence of Israel, and to give an earnest of the conversion of the Gentiles.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The sincerity of our repentance must be evinced by obedience, in those particulars especially about which we have been most rebellious: and the Lord seals the forgiveness of his offending servants, by again employing them in his honourable work. But he will not soften or alter his messages, because of any man's reluctance to deliver them, or to hear them; or because of the numbers or the power of those whom they condemn. The fear of the power and wrath of God, and the experience of his mercy, will raise us above the fear of men; and he can render the most timorous bold as lions, to proclaim his truths in the midst of his most powerful enemies. We are often needlessly afraid of men in obeying God; for he gives his word a more favourable reception than we expected; and sometimes the heathen will be more attentive than his professed worshippers. It is by faith, that sinners, when warned, are moved by fear to inquire after deliverance from the wrath to come; a small degree of light may convince men, that fasting, humiliation before God, confession of sin, prayer, and turning away from known iniquity and impiety, are probable means of escaping wrath, and obtaining, though not of meriting mercy; and kings and nobles cannot do a more essential service to the people, than in leading them, by their authority and example, to these religious exercises. But no external mortifications or devotions can be of any use, if men do not turn from the evil of their ways. If idolaters, without any express revelation of mercy, or instruction in the truths and will of God, at the call of an Israelitish prophet, upon a mere peradventure we may escape destruction, were thus earnest, fervent, prompt, self-denying, and humble in seeking mercy: how inexcusable will professed Christians be, who, notwithstanding all the warnings, instructions, invitations, and promises of Scripture, persist in unbelief, impenitence, self-indulgence and procrastination! But if God so readily pardoneth the inhabitants of this great city, where it may be apprehended the greater part were only transiently impressed and partially returned: how readily will he pardon the broken-hearted penitent, and the believing supplicant at his mercy-seat! We may also here see the blessed effects of the resurrection of Christ, and the consequent preaching of his Gospel, in the conversion and salvation of the Gentiles; and let us pray that this preaching and these effects may pervade the whole earth.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—4. It might have been expected, that Jonah would be very humble and submissive, in consequence of his former misconduct and the merciful dealings of God with him; and that the success of his mission, in the repentance and preservation of the Ninevites, would inspire him with lively joy and gratitude; but on the contrary we find, that he was greatly displeas'd and very angry with God himself, for showing mercy to Nineveh; though mercy alone had preserv'd his life, and sav'd his soul from hell! In this rebellious frame he ventured to expostulate with God, and to excuse, nay, vindicate, his former disobedience! When first commanded to prophesy against Nineveh, he was aware of the event. He knew that God would mercifully spare the city, and that he should be stigmatized as a false prophet; being well acquainted with the mercy and goodness of God towards his offending creatures. And now, seeing this had turned out as he expected, he besought God to slay him and end his pain, for death was more desirable in his case than life: as if the Lord had done him an injury in delivering him from the belly of the whale! We must allow something in this case to the feelings and prejudices of the Israelites, under that dispensation: for they were too apt to despise the Gentiles, and to deem the mercy of God to them a deduction from their own privileges. Jonah might also consider Nineveh as a formidable enemy to his nation, and in that view wish for its destruction. Some think, he had a mistaken zeal for the honour of God, and thought that he would appear to have broken his word, in not executing the judgment that he had denounced.—But it is evident, that he was greatly influenced by a proud and rebellious spirit; that he considered the Ninevites as unworthy of his regard; and that he had neither expected nor desired their welfare, but had only come to denounce and witness their destruction. It is equally evident that he was not duly humbled for his own sins; and had an undue regard to his own reputation; fearing the disgrace of being thought a false prophet, and not daring to trust God to take care of his credit and safety. In this frame of mind, he overlooked the good done, and the glory of the divine goodness and mercy, as of little consequence. Yet the Lord reproved him with gentleness, and inquired whether he had cause to be thus discomposed, or did right in these peevish complaints and impatient wishes for death, when such mercy had been shown him? To which he seems to have made no answer, but to have continued sullen and fretful.

wished in himself to die, and said, It is better for me to die than to live.

9 And God said to Jonah, * Doest thou well to be angry for the gourd? And he said, ° I † do well to be angry, † even unto death.

10 Then said the LORD, Thou hast ‡ had pity on the gourd, for the which

V. 5—8. Doubtless Jonah might have been hospitably entertained at Nineveh, and allowed to live according to his own rules, had he been disposed to be friendly: and he might have been usefully employed in confirming the inhabitants in their good purposes, and in instructing them in the truth and worship of God. But though he had received an intimation that the city would be spared, he seems not to have believed it: and he would neither venture himself in the city, nor have any fellowship with the inhabitants; as if he meant, notwithstanding their repentance, to shake off the dust of his feet, for a testimony against them. He therefore left the city, and made a booth or tent to dwell in, till he should see the event. It pleased God, however, very graciously and miraculously to prepare a large gourd, which with rapid growth and luxuriant foliage, was speedily ready to afford him a refreshing shadow from the heat of the sun, from which it seems his tent could not defend him. This tended to appease his grief and calm his spirits; nay, he was exceedingly glad on account of this personal accommodation; whilst the repentance and preservation of a great city made him very angry and peevish! To check this disproportionate joy, and to make way for his further humiliation and instruction, the Lord caused a worm to destroy the root of the gourd, so that the next day it withered: and a sultry east-wind increasing the burning heat of the morning-sun, Jonah was so oppressed, that he fainted, grew more impatient than ever, and wished again for death as the most desirable deliverance from his misery. Some think, that he left the city, before he had seen the tokens of repentance among the inhabitants; and others, that he waited till the forty days were almost expired, when, dreading some sudden destruction, he dared not to stay any longer. It, however, seems most probable, that he both witnessed the conduct of the Ninevites, and had some intimations of the Lord's gracious purposes, before he left the city; and that he retired from it immediately after.

V. 9—11. The Lord was graciously pleased to renew his expostulations with Jonah at this crisis, and to inquire whether the withering of the gourd could warrant such anger and impatience? But he proudly and passionately justified himself, asserting that he had cause to be angry even unto death; that is, to break his heart, and to die with grief and vexation. Upon this the Lord graciously condescended to argue the matter with him. Had he pity on the gourd, or such a regard for it, merely for his own convenience and refreshment? and was he very angry when it withered; though it was not his work or property, and had cost him no labour, and though it was naturally of a swift growth and a withering nature? And was it not right, that the Lord should spare Nineveh, in which were so vast a number of his creatures, formed by his power and for the purposes of his glory? If all the inhabitants of that city, who were capable of knowing good from evil, without one exception, were deserving of the most tremendous punishment and ripe for vengeance; yet there were no less than a hundred and twenty thousand infants, incapable of knowing their right hand from their left, who were no more criminal than the offspring of others of man's fallen race: and would Jonah quarrel with his Maker for sparing the city for their sakes? There was also much cattle in the city, to which God had respect, as far more valuable than the withering gourd. And it was further implied, that among the many hundreds of thousands of grown persons in the city, there were numbers of true penitents; and the general humiliation and reformation that had been effected, rendered it peculiarly suitable for God to glorify his mercy in their preservation. Hence it might be inferred, that Jonah was deeply criminal, in being so much concerned about his own ease, comfort, and credit; and so unconcerned about the honour of God and the benefit of his creatures. We may hope, that this silenced and humbled Jonah; that he at length learned submission; and, being made to know the evil of his own heart, that he would be prepared to serve God in the prophetic office with more humility and propriety, than he had hitherto done.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

Human depravity breaks out in such varied ways, as occasions are given, that it is not easy to say what a man is incapable of. Regard to his own honour, or that of his sect, or a proud contempt of others, may possibly seduce even a believer in an unguarded hour, to quarrel with the goodness of the Lord: nay malignity, in some occasional emotions, may delude a man to think it more desirable to witness or seal the ruin of others, than to be instrumental to their preservation. Indeed this is the root of all bigotry and persecution, as far as pious men have ever been betrayed into it: (Luke ix. 51—56.) Even a faithful minister may, in some possible circumstances, be tempted to impatience, by witnessing unexpected success to his own labours, in places where he had little desire of it, whilst his sanguine hopes and ardent wishes for others have been disappointed; or when his success was productive of bitter effects to his character or interests. When great good is done by those, whose conduct is so inconsistent, and so tends to prejudice men against their ministry; it must be most evident, that “the excellency of the power is of God and not of man.” Nothing but a deep knowledge of our own hearts can explain to us how it is possible for a true believer to pray in the language of rebellion and self-justification respecting things most flagrantly evil. How a man, that hath been convicted, corrected, humbled, marvellously delivered, and made thankful for such mercies, can be induced again to vindicate before God his former transgression: How a prophet could decline preaching for fear he should do good; or repent of preaching because he had been singularly successful: Or justify his fleeing from his work, because he knew that the Lord was gracious and merciful: Or mention these endearing perfections of God, to complain of them: Or how the severest discipline, and the most marvellous deliverances should fail to cure this perverseness. Yet of these things our hearts are capable, and these are but a small part of their deceitfulness and desperate wickedness. This would appear, if God should now, (as he one day will,) publish an impartial history of the secret thoughts of our hearts, in our varied experiences. It is, however, most criminal to indulge this proud and peevish spirit in our prayers: yet this too will be our case, unless we carefully watch over our passions, when under great difficulties and strong temptations. We are even capable of sincerely thanking God one day for sparing our lives, and of fretting the next because we are left to live in trouble! And we are apt to think it better for us to die than to live: not so much because heaven is more desirable than earth, or lest we should live to dishonour God; but because we are troubled by our own imaginations and corruptions; or because we are exposed to reproach and the cross, amidst our successful endeavours to glorify God and do good to mankind. In general we are most apt to desire death, when we are least fit to meet our Judge: so that the mercy of God is as much displayed in bearing with his peevish servants, as in pardoning repenting rebels; and his gentle reproofs most effectually show the evil of our discontent and impatience.

V. 5—11.

We often create ourselves uneasiness by our folly: nay, some are tempted to retire from public stations when they have the fairest opportunities of usefulness! Yet the Lord often sends gracious consolations, when we merit heavy trials, and soothes those sorrows that result from our sin and folly. The same strong ungoverned passions, that expose us to be cast down at trifling difficulties, will render us exceedingly glad of trivial advantages, and dispose us to idolize our dying comforts. These the Lord often recalls, to teach us that all our gourds must wither, and that he alone is the durable Portion of his people. When we are discontented without cause, we may expect some real affliction: and the Lord sometimes seems intent with his own hand to increase our sorrows, when we are ready to faint under them, in order to humble us for our future good. But pride and anger render men incapable of perceiving the most glaring absurdities in their own conduct, and dispose them to vindicate the most daring rebellions. Our discontent, murmurs, contentions, and despondings are often about such trifles, that the cause of them needs only be mentioned, in order to their being exposed! The Lord takes from us what was never ours, and was never likely to continue with us; he sends a little pain or reproach instead of everlasting misery and contempt; and we think we do well to be angry, and even break our hearts with impatience; and speak and act, as if our grief were insoluble and our wound incurable! Whilst we thus selfishly and in unbelief regard our own ease, interest, or credit, we proportionably disregard the glory of God, and the lives and souls of our neighbours; as if these were not worth our attention, compared with our own feelings: so contrary are we to the law of loving God supremely, and our neighbour as ourselves! And such need have we of the pardoning mercy, the atoning blood, and new-creating Spirit of our God! But his mercies are over all his works: he has a property in his creatures, and will leave none to perish, but for the honour of his justice, holiness, truth, and wisdom. He delighteth in pardoning the penitent; our infant-offspring are the objects of his tenderest regard; and even the irrational creatures share his compassion and bounty. Let us then rejoice, and be thankful for, and imitate, the mercies of our God: and whilst he condescends to expostulate with us on our selfishness; may our hearts be humbled and softened to compassion and goodwill to all men, and prepared for every service to which we are called.

BOOK OF MICAH.

THIS prophet was ' of the kingdom of Judah, as he only makes mention of kings who reigned over that ' country.—Mareshah, (14, 15,) is placed in Judah.' (Josh. xv. 44. 2 Chr. xi. 8.) (Bp. Newcombe.)—' He is called the Morasthite, from the place of his nativity, Morasthi, which St. Jerom ' distinguishes from Mareshah; though he places them both in the land of Judah.' (Lowth.)—Micah was contemporary with Isaiah, and Hosea: but it is probable that he began to prophecy later than they. The date of the third chapter, is fixed in Jeremiah to the reign of Hezekiah: but nothing further is known with certainty, concerning the time when his predictions were delivered.

He addressed his messages both to Judah and Israel: and his book, like that of the other prophets, contains sharp reproofs of sin, awful denunciations of wrath, encouraging promises and predictions of Christ, and of the establishment and prosperity of his kingdom. It is evident that Micah was acknowledged to be a prophet, and that his prophecy was well known in the time of Jeremiah. (Jer. xxvi. 18.) His authority, as a prophet, and that of his book as a part of Scripture, are twice appealed to in the New Testament, in respect of the place where the Messiah should be born. (Matt. ii. 5. John vii. 42.) Our Lord uses nearly his words, concerning the persecutions, to which his disciples would be exposed. (Com. vii. 6. with Matt. x. 35, 36;) and many of his predictions have received an undeniable accomplishment. (Notes, iii. 8—12. iv. 2—4. v. 2—6;) though others are not yet fulfilled. His style hath been much admired by the best judges: though it is occasionally obscure, through conciseness and sudden transitions from one subject to another.

* sins, in such a manner, that you cannot be able to deny the charge.' (Louth.) The two nations, (or peoples,) namely, Judah and Israel, yea, the whole land of Canaan and all its fulness, were summoned to appear before God, who, from his holy temple in heaven, (of which the temple on mount Zion was but a shadow,) would be both Witness to detect their guilt, and Judge to denounce sentence against them. He was about to leave his place: (his mercy-seat, or his glorious throne above,) to come down and enter into judgment with them: then would he tread upon and level the high places of the earth, or reduce the power and pride of the mightiest princes: the very mountains would melt like wax under him; and the valleys would be rent with chasms, such as are made by impetuous torrents when poured down from a steep place; that is, all ranks of men would be reduced to the utmost confusion and misery. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5-7. Samaria was the great source of wickedness to Israel, and Jerusalem to Judah; from whence idolatry and iniquity, sanctioned by authority and example, were diffused through the land. Therefore, Samaria would first be visited, as a warning to Jerusalem; and it would be reduced to a heap of rubbish and stones, such as were seen collected in vineyards, when the ground was prepared for planting the vines. For the stones of their sumptuous edifices would be poured down into the adjacent valley, and the city razed even to the foundations: their graven images would be seized or destroyed by the conquerors, with all their consecrated treasures; and that idolatrous worship would be abolished; these riches had been collected as infamously, as a harlot obtains her hire, and they should be wasted and spoiled in a manner equally disgraceful.

V. 8, 9. The prophet expressed his deep concern for the calamities that he predicted, by representing himself ready to appear as one frantic with grief; and not only weeping and howling for anguish of spirit, but stripping himself and going naked, as an emblem of their captivity and slavery; (Marg. Ref.) and as making a most doleful noise, h'e that of dragons or owls. For Samaria's wound would be quite incurable; and the Assyrians, having destroyed the kingdom of Israel, would invade Judah, and march even to the gates of Jerusalem. This they afterwards did under the conduct of Sennacherib.—The word rendered dragons, frequently signifies sea-monsters; but here a land-animal seems to be intended. 'The word may signify a kind of wild beast like a dog, be-tween a dog and a fox, or a wolf and a dog, (our English travellers call them Jakalls;) which abiding in the fields and waste places, make in the night a lament-able howling noise.' Owls or ostriches. 'During the lonesome part of the night, they often make a very doleful and hideous noise. I have often heard them, as if they were in the greatest agonies, an action, beautifully alluded to by the prophet Micah.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 10-16. The prophet seems here to have had in prospect both the ruin of Samaria and the desolations of Israel by Shalmanesar, and the invasion of Judah by Sennacherib, kings of Assyria. These successes of idolaters against JEHOVAH's worshippers, ought not to be declared at Gath, lest the Philistines should rejoice; (2 Sam. i. 20.) In their presence the Israelites ought not to weep at all. ^a The word Aphrah signifies dust; and the prophet, it is ^b likely, puts it here for Ophrah, in the tribe of Benjamin, (Josh. xviii. 23.) that the name may better suit their ^c condition? In the distressed cities or towns of Israel and Judah, the inhabitants would be called to roll themselves in the dust. Saphir signifies fair or beautiful; (some think Samaria was intended;) but its inhabitants would be stripped of their comely ornaments, torn from their habitations, and led away as naked slaves. Zaanai, (Josh. xv. 37.) Zaanai was intended;) but its inhabitants would be stripped of their comely ornaments, torn from their habitations, and led away as naked slaves. Zaanai, (Josh. xv. 37.) Zaanai signifies a place of flocks; Bethel, a house that is near: the inhabitants of the former would not go forth to assist the latter under their distresses; but the enemy would soon fix his station among them, and they would share the fate of their neighbours, and the invaders would obtain a large compensation for their encamping before the city. Maroth signifies bitterness, (Josh. xv. 59. Maarath.) but some think that Ramoth was meant, which signifies exaltations. The inhabitants carefully looked out for and expected better tidings or better times: but evil came from the Lord upon them, and even proceeded to the gates of Jerusalem. Lachish was a city of Judah, but it bordered on Israel; and having learned their idolatries, it communicated them to the inhabitants of other cities, and even to those of Jerusalem: therefore the city would certainly be taken and plundered by the Assyrians; and the inhabitants would be glad to flee away in chariots drawn by horses, dromedaries, or the fleetest animals; and they would give presents to Moresheth-gath, some town belonging to the Philistines, to shelter them from the invaders. — Akzib signifies a lie; and thus that city would deceive the expectation of the kings of Israel. The Lord would also bring the Assyrians, or their colonies, to be the heirs of Mareshah, which signifies an heir, or an inheritance: and they would also seize upon Adullam, and mar all the glory of Israel, 'The honourable men shall be forced to hide themselves in the cave of Adullam, as David did when he fled from Saul.' (Lenth.) (Marg. Ref.)—The nation might therefore prepare, (as a mother,) to show every token of distress and mourning over her children, brought up delicately and greatly delighted in, (casting off her ornaments, and cutting off her hair as the eagle molts its feathers;) for they would all in a short time be carried into captivity.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They who would escape the Lord's indignation, must hearken diligently to the reproofs and warnings, as well as the doctrines and encouragements, of the sacred oracles.—The Lord will bear witness against, as well as denounce judgment upon, the workers of wickedness; and his holy temple will not protect hypocrites, but enhance their condemnation. When he comes forth from his place to execute judgment, the haughty and powerful of the earth will tremble and fall before him: for how can sinners endure that presence, before which the elements shall melt and the whole creation shall vanish away? But our transgressions alone render his presence terrible to us: and if sin be pardoned and subdued we have nothing to fear, at death or in the day of judgment. Capital cities and great men too often give examples of impiety and iniquity, which flow from them throughout whole kingdoms, and infect all the lower orders in society; and the judgments of God will follow in the same channels, and in the same proportion: for ringleaders in wickedness must expect to have the first or largest measure of punishment; and that wealth, which is obtained by vice, will be spent or lost with disgrace and misery. But we should lament the distresses, that we foresee coming upon the ungodly: and tears seem far more congenial to our condition in this world than laughter. No hand can cure the wounds that the Lord inflicts, except his own: we may hope, wait, and seek for good, but evil must come upon us, unless he be reconciled to us: all other refuges but Christ must be lies to those who trust in them: other heirs will succeed to every inheritance, except that of heaven; and all glory will be turned into shame, if not connected with the honour that cometh from God only. Sinners may now selfishly disregard the sufferings of their neighbours; yet their turn will soon come. But it is most grievous, when the sins and sorrows of the Church are so notorious, as to rejoice the hearts, or embolden the blasphemies, of her avowed enemies.

V. 12, 13. Many expositors interpret these verses, according to the context, as a prediction of the captivity of Israel and Judah. After great numbers had perished, the remnant of them would be assembled, as a flock of sheep in Bozrah into the midst of the fold, to be thence taken out for the slaughter; and the multitude of them, or that of their enemies, would make a great noise and confusion. The Assyrian or Chaldean commander would march before the army, to break his way into the city; and after the walls had been destroyed, the gates would be opened, by which they would go forth with their spoil and prisoners, with the king of the victorious army before them; and the Lord himself at the head of them, prospering their undertakings and using them as his executioners: and indeed this seems the most obvious interpretation. Yet very respectable expositors understand the passage as a prophecy of the conversion of the Jews and Israelites to Christ. The Lord would not only bring back the remnant of the nation from Babylon, multiply them as a flock of sheep, and turn their mourning into joyful acclamations; but he would in due time bring them into the Christian Church as the sheep of his pasture. The Lord Jesus, in the character of The Breaker, would open their way through all obstacles, into a state of communion with God, and happiness in his favour: he would break through all hinderances, by his miraculous incarnation, his obedience and sufferings, resurrection, ascension, and intercession; by leading captivity captive, and opening the gates of heaven to all believers: and by the work of his Spirit in their hearts, breaking off the fetters of sin and Satan. Thus he hath gone before, and his people follow, breaking, in his strength, through the hosts of their enemies, that obstruct their way to heaven. Their King hath passed before them, and the Lord is at their head, and he leads them forward to share his victories and triumphs, till they enter the same everlasting mansions, and death the last enemy be destroyed. The conversion and restoration of the Jews, according to this interpretation, are especially foretold.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The more deliberately wickedness is contrived and committed, the greater guilt is contracted: and men must give an account of all that passes in their hearts, on their beds, and in their most secret retirements. Yet many think every thing allowable that is practicable, and which for the present may be done with impunity; regardless of the wo that God hath denounced against such successful plunderers! The unwearied diligence of wicked men in their sinful pursuits, should shame us out of our indolence in the service of God. When covetousness occupies the heart, violence or fraud will commonly employ the hands: and whilst men thus oppress whole families, and rob even their remote posterity of their heritage, to enrich themselves; they forget, that the almighty God devises evil against them, from which they will find no possible way of escape; and that an evil time is coming, when they shall no more behave themselves with haughtiness and insolence. Then their joyful congratulations will be turned into doleful lamentations, that they are utterly spoiled, driven from their earthly portion, and excluded for ever from all share in the inheritance of the congregation of the Lord. No wonder such men hate the faithful messengers of God, who would put them to shame for their sins: they have only the name of Christians, or they would not think to modify the language of the Holy Spirit by human authority, to silence those whom God commands to speak, or to teach his ministers to accommodate their doctrine to humour their lusts. These are not the doings of true Israelites, who are without guile, and who love and profit by all the words of God. Such nominal Christians are in fact the worst enemies of God and his Church, and often join persecution of his people with oppression of the widow and the orphan: and their polluted privileges will soon be taken from them and turn to their destruction. Teachers who will recommend self-indulgence by their doctrine and example, best suit them; and they will generally be given up to such deceivers. But Christ's sheep hear his voice and follow him: he gathers them into his fold and feeds them in his pasture; and an innumerable multitude are already collected, who are before the throne joyfully ascribing salvation to God and to the Lamb that was slain. As he hath rent the veil, and opened our way to the throne of grace; as he hath burst the grave and opened the gates of heaven, and entered as our Forerunner: let us depend on him, and follow him, and so break through the maxims and customs of the world, the opposition of sin and Satan, and all the difficulties in our way to glory. And when we are called to arise, and depart out of this polluted world to our rest in heaven, we need fear no evil in passing through death and the grave; for he will be with us, and bring us both in soul and body to his holy habitation.

3 Who also eat the flesh of my people, and flay their skin from off them; and they break their bones, and chop them in pieces, as for the pot, and as flesh within the caldron.

4 ¶ Then shall they cry unto the Lord, but he will not hear them: he will even hide his face from them at that time, as they have behaved themselves ill in their doings.

5 Thus saith the Lord concerning the prophets that make my people err, that bite with their teeth, and cry, Peace; and he that putteth not into their mouths, they even prepare war against him:

6 Therefore a night shall be unto you, that ye shall not have a vision: and it shall be dark unto you, that ye shall not divine; and the sun shall go down over the prophets, and the day shall be dark over them.

7 Then shall the seers be ashamed, and the diviners confounded: yea, they shall not cover their lips; for there is no answer of God.

8 ¶ But truly I am full of power by the Spirit of the Lord, and of judgment, and of might, to declare unto Jacob his transgression, and to Israel his sin.

9 Hear this, I pray you, ye heads of the house of Jacob, and princes of the house of Israel, that abhor judgment, and pervert all equity.

10 They build up Zion with blood, and Jerusalem with iniquity.

11 The heads thereof judge for reward, and the priests thereof teach for hire, and the prophets thereof divine for money: yet will they lean upon the Lord, and say, Is not the Lord among us? no evil can come upon us.

12 Therefore shall Zion for your sake be plowed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps, and the mountain of the sea as the high places of the forest.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1-4. The rulers of Israel might be intended by this address, as well as those of Judah; yet the latter seems to be chiefly meant. They had every opportunity of knowing the rules of justice and equity, and it was peculiarly incumbent on them to understand and practise them; yet they carelessly, nay, wilfully, continued ignorant of them, or decided causes and enacted laws in opposition to them. They evidently hated every thing good and all pious men; and loved wickedness, and the wicked, by whom they could serve their own base purposes. Instead of feeding and protecting the Lord's flock, they fleeced, butchered, and devoured them; reducing the poor people to the deepest misery by their cruel exactions and oppressions. They would therefore loudly cry out under the oppressions of their enemies or other great distresses; but the Lord would utterly disregard them, according to their behaviour to him and their poor brethren. The marginal references will show those who examine them, that these verses are also peculiarly descriptive of the character and conduct of the Jewish scribes, priests, and rulers, in the days of Christ and his apostles; and perhaps predict the subsequent condition of that people.

V. 5-7. The false prophets likewise were highly criminal; and indeed the cause of the general wickedness of the nation. They flattered the people into a delusive expectation of peace in their evil ways; yet they were ready to bite and devour such as opposed them, and even to declare war against those who would not satisfy their avarice and rapacity, being "greedy dogs, that could never have enough;" so that their peaceable and soft language was restricted to their prophesying before those who paid well for them. Therefore the approaching distresses, should confute their prognostications, and prevent them from pretending to any more visions. The sun of their prosperity, reputation, and hope, would suddenly be darkened, and leave them in misery, contempt, and despair. God would shame and silence all such seers and diviners; and they should cover their lips as mourners or unclean persons; confessing that they could obtain no answer from God to their anxious inquiries concerning the end of their calamities. (Marg. Ref.) How exactly does this describe the state of that once favoured nation, for above the last seven hundred years?

V. 8-12. It is probable that Micah was greatly opposed by the wicked princes and false prophets: but he knew and confidently declared, that he spake by the authority of God and the inspiration of his Spirit: that he was abundantly endued with honesty, wisdom, and energy, to deliver his faithful message, whether they would hear it or not; and that he was especially commissioned to declare unto his people the number and heinousness of their sins. He therefore entreated the rulers of the people to attend, and not to persist in fighting against God. They had indeed abhorred all justice and perverted equity; they had beautified the city with magnificent houses, and fortified it with walls, and perhaps repaired, or added buildings to, the temple; but it was done with money that had been the wages of murder and oppression. The magistrates, priests, and prophets, were alike mercenary and avaricious: yet they presumed upon their external privileges, the temple of God, and their formal worship: so that when they were warned of approaching judgments, they inquired whether the Lord were not among them, and were confident no evil would befall them. To punish therefore their hypocrisy and iniquity, the city would certainly be desolated, and become heaps of rubbish; and the mountain where the temple stood would be rendered as waste and unfrequented as the forests and deserts. This prophecy was delivered in the reign of Hezekiah, and probably in the beginning of it, (Note, Jer. xxvi. 16—19.) The princes, priests, and prophets, in general either discountenanced his zeal for reformation, or concurred in a hypocritical manner; but the king was decided, and these predictions seem to have encouraged and quickened his endeavours, and to have stirred up more persons to concur with him: by which means the judgments were retarded, but not averted. The destruction of the city and temple by the Romans, (as well as that by the Chaldeans,) seems to have been predicted; in which the ground, where the temple stood, is said to have been broken up with a plow by the conquerors. (Marg. Ref.) The avowed counsel of Caiaphas to put our Lord to death, without alleging any charge against him, that the nation might not perish, was a remarkable instance of that carnal policy, by which princes and priests have attempted to build Zion with blood, even the blood of the prophets, apostles, and ministers of God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Princes and magistrates are more concerned to know judgment than other men, as their conduct has more important and extensive effects; and princes in Israel have abundant opportunity of knowing it. Yet, through human depravity and the temptations peculiar to their situation, they are often ignorant of the rules by which they ought to govern, judge, or act: and sometimes they most evidently prove, that they hate the good and love the evil, by their iniquitous exactions and oppressions. Thus thousands are made miserable, to humour the caprice, to maintain the luxury and ostentation, or to gratify the ambition or avarice of one cruel tyrant? But let not such men expect to be heard or favoured by God, when they shall cry unto him in extreme distress; for "they shall have judgment without mercy, who have showed no mercy." Alas! such wholesome truths can seldom reach their ears, who are environed with flatterers or teachers of lies, whom they reward with a share of their plunder and riot. Such are smooth in their doctrine, soft in their manners, and courtly in their address: but they can snarl and bite too, if their inferiors offend them; and contend furiously and maliciously with those that refuse to satisfy their mercenary demands. And though they are dumb dogs, that cannot bark in the cause of God, yet they open their mouths wide, to brawl and to devour. But the light that is in them is darkness: their prosperity and honour will soon end in misery and disgrace, and their sanguine hope in black despair: they will be ashamed of their lying divinations and erroneous doctrines, by which they have fatally misled the people; and they shall have no answer from God in the time of their distress. On the other hand, he who preaches by the authority and according to the oracles of God, from zeal for his glory and love to the souls of men; who is conscious of integrity and assured of the truth of his doctrine; may speak with constancy and confidence, in the midst of calumny and opposition; though he should be called upon to expose the transgressions of princes and priests who abhor judgment, and prostitute their important offices to the gratification of their vile avarice, ambition, malice, or sensuality. For even such men may be so blinded as to have a presumptuous confidence in God, and expect security in sin, because of their abused privileges and hypocritical profession: but they must be told that they are in the way of destruction; and it should be known by all, that rulers and teachers of this description are the causes of ruin to churches and nations, and answerable for all the calamities which for their sakes come upon them.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1-3. (Notes, &c. Is. ii. 1-5.) The connexion of this prophecy, (which hath already been explained,) with the close of the foregoing chapter, shows, that the establishment of the Christian Church, in consequence of the abrogation of the Mosaic dispensation, and the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, were predicted. But though it hath in a measure been fulfilling ever since those events, yet its great accomplishment must be future: for the Scripture cannot be broken; and the nations have not yet so submitted to the Prince of peace, as to beat their swords into plow-shares, &c.

V. 4. This beautiful addition to the prophecy, as it stands in Isaiah, denotes the sweet harmony which in those happy days shall prevail among Christians, in communing with God and with each other; their perfect security, and peaceful industry; their thankful and comfortable use of temporal plenty, and the abundance of their spiritual consolations. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. The Gentiles were tenacious of the religion of their ancestors, and took pleasure in worshipping their imaginary deities: whilst Israel had always been disposed to grow weary of the worship of God, and to relapse into idolatry. But in the predicted period the true Israel will cleave to the Lord with purpose of heart, and delight greatly in worshipping his name and doing his will, with constancy and perseverance. This is, in some measure, the desire, purpose, and conduct of true believers in every age: God is their Portion, and his service will be their happiness for ever and ever. 'This will be remarkably fulfilled at the general conversion of the Jews, when this prophecy shall receive its utmost completion.' (Louth.)

V. 6, 7. The collecting of the enfeebled and dispersed Jewish captives, from Babylon to Jerusalem, (as sheep that had been lamed, or driven away by robbers; and their subsequent increase into a considerable remnant, and then into a strong nation, under the government of the Lord, formed but a faint shadow of the rapid increase of the Christian Church, amidst all her persecutions and afflictions, in the first age after Christ: and this was but an earnest of the healing, purifying, increasing, and prospering of the Church, which we wait for; when the kingdom of the Lord shall be conspicuously set up, the Jews shall be re-admitted into the Church, and the Gentiles converted: and this reign of Christ shall continue, till it is succeeded by the everlasting kingdom of heaven.—'Though I have broken the power of my people, removed them into captivity far off, and afflicted them; yet will I restore them to their country, I will send them the Messiah, and will always be their King. For ever. This will be fulfilled at the future restoration of the Jews.'—(Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 8-10. Mount Zion was the tower of the Lord's flock under the old dispensation, the centre of their union, and the special residence of their Protector; and the temple was its strong-hold. Thither Christ the good Shepherd and the Ruler of his people came, and there first he set up his kingdom. This kingdom would be like the first dominion of Israel in the days of David and Solomon; and would surpass and supersede all other monarchies. The Son of David would come to Jerusalem and establish his kingdom, and thence its influence would extend to other nations. And though that city would soon after be destroyed, yet the evangelical Church, the spiritual Zion, would succeed to it; in which Christ reigns for the benefit of his people, and his cause must prevail even to the end of the world. Indeed, the calamities to be endured by Zion from the Assyrian invasion, and during the Chaldean ravages, and the taking and destruction of the city, (which were typical of the subsequent calamities of the Jewish nation and of the Church;) would cause her to cry aloud as a woman in her pangs; and as if there were no king to protect, or counsellor to direct her. But why did she yield to disconsolate sorrow? Let her remember, that her pains were those of travail, not the agonies of death, that she might have hope under them, and know how to exert herself for deliverance. She would certainly be driven out of the city, and dwell as in an open field, and even be dragged to Babylon as a captive; yet that crisis would make way for her happy restoration and for better times, when the Lord would redeem her from the hand of her enemies. This event shadowed forth the recovery of the Jews from their present dispersions, and the deliverance of the Christian Church from antichristian tyranny.

V. 11-13. Many nations would be collected against Zion, to pollute her by their idolatries, or forward and exult in her calamities. But they would not understand that the Lord collected them, as sheaves of corn are gathered upon the floor to be threshed: and Zion, weak and dispirited as she was, should be strengthened, as with horns of iron and hoofs of brass, to trample them down and beat them in pieces: and being enriched by their plunder, she would consecrate her gain to the Lord of the whole earth, by whose assistance these victories would be obtained. There occurs nothing in the history of the Jewish church, that fully accords to this prediction. Sennacherib's army was not destroyed by the Jews; nor had they any hand in the subversion of the Babylonish monarchy. The victories of the Maccabees over Antiochus might be a partial accomplishment of it; and so might that of the Christian Church over the power of her persecutors, after the conversion of Constantine. But the grand accomplishment is yet in futurity. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Whilst we wait for those last days, in which the kingdom of Christ shall be exalted above all other dominions, and extended over all nations; let us be thankful for our privileges, and excite ourselves and each other to frequent the ordinances of our God; that we may learn, and walk in his holy ways, receiving the law from his hands, that, being written in our hearts by his Spirit, it may evidence our interest in the righteousness of the great Redeemer. Let us also endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, and to live peaceably with all men: that whilst the nations of the earth still continue to learn and practise war, and numbers delight in discord and confusion, it may appear by our conduct, that harmony, equity, truth, and love, are genuine effects of faith in Christ, and of his Gospel, when truly obeyed. Even in this world of contention and violence, if we have peace with God, and with our consciences and our brethren, we may rest securely under the divine protection, and fear no enemy: we may rejoice in our privileges, and walk in the name of our God, with grateful praises and unabated alacrity and vigour: and we should cleave to him with more constancy, than the men of this world do to their idolized possessions and pleasures. Even the weak in faith, and those who have been wounded and made to halt, in their conflicts with temptation, or have been cast out by their brethren, or driven away by persecution, or weighed down by affliction, may yet hope in the Lord. When they look to him, he will gather, strengthen, and heal them, and take care of them, as their King and Protector: even as he will render his enfeebled oppressed Church a strong nation, and superior to all enemies or competitors. In his glory his people shall be glorious, and the feeblest believer shall rejoice in the joy of his inheritance: and all the afflictions of the Church and of the believer, are sure to end happily. We should then cry aloud with the prayer of faith, not with the voice of despondency, under our distresses. We have an omnipotent King to rule over us, and an all-wise Counsellor to advise us: his promises engage that the crisis of extreme sorrow shall introduce that most joyful deliverance, to all who love and obey him; for he will redeem them from all their enemies. But they who unite against Zion, to pollute or triumph over her, are ignorant of these intentions and counsels of our God, and are not aware that they are compassing their own destruction, and that they are only collecting together to be destroyed. As the strength and victory of believers are wholly from the Lord, they can do no less than ascribe all the glory to his name, and consecrate all their powers, advantages, and possessions to his service. Let us thus gird on our armour, and arise to fight the good fight of faith: and amidst our conflicts let us rejoice in hope of being made more than conquerors, and anticipate the songs of heaven; and dedicating all our talents to his service, let us seek and pray, that as the Redeemer of sinners, and the Object of all love and worship to his ransomed people, he may become the Lord of the whole earth.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1. The victory of Zion over her enemies having been predicted in the close of the preceding chapter, they are here challenged to collect their forces for the assault. Either Nineveh or Babylon seems to be meant by "the daughter of troops," as their prosperity arose from success in war, and they were renowned for valiant soldiers. The king of Assyria besieged Samaria, and he or his captains insulted Hosea, the judge or king of Israel, with all indignities; as the victorious king of Babylon did Zedekiah, when he had besieged and taken Jerusalem. Some have thought, that the outrageous conduct of Sennacherib and Rabshakeh to Hezekiah was meant: but Sennacherib did not lay siege to Jerusalem, nor was Hezekiah ever in his power. Many, however, suppose, that Rome was intended by "the daughter of troops;" and that the Romans were called upon to collect their armies to cution by the conversion of the Roman emperors; and to the future promulgation of the Gospel, and the ruin of all Antichristian, Pagan, and Mahometan powers, by the numerous and able instruments that the Lord will raise up for these purposes.

V. 7—9. The remnant of Israel, that was converted to Christ in the primitive times, namely, the apostles, evangelists, and first teachers and professors of the Gospel, were scattered among many nations, as the drops of dew or the showers of rain on the earth, which cause the grass to grow in those places where no human culture is employed, and without waiting for the help of man. Thus they went into the cities and villages of the Gentiles, not as sent for by them, or commissioned by human authority, or depending on the power or wisdom of man; but as immediately employed, qualified, and prospered by God: and by their doctrine, prayers, and example, they were the instruments of rendering those barren deserts fruitful in a large increase of spiritual worshippers, and holy servants of God our Saviour. No doubt the converted Jews will hereafter exhibit a still more striking completion of this prophecy. But to those who neglected and opposed this salvation, these same persons would be terrible and destructive as lions among the beasts of the forest, or even amongst the flocks of helpless sheep. For their doctrine would condemn them: and the Lord concurring, by his providence, would cut off all their enemies. The destruction of the enemies of the Jews, after their future restoration to their own land, seems to be here predicted, (Hurg. Ref.) 'The former verse described the benefits the converted Jews should bring to those Gentiles who were disposed to embrace the Gospel: this (8) instructs us how terrible adversaries they will prove to them who persist in their enmity to them and to the truth.' (Lowth.)

V. 10—15. In those happy times, the Lord promised to wean the people from all confidence in chariots, horses, cities, and strong-holds; even as though they had been entirely destroyed: and to purge out all sorcery, witchcraft, and idolatry, and the relics of those abominations from among them: and having done this, he would destroy their enemies, (so the word translated cities may be rendered;) and "execute vengeance, in anger and in fury, on the nations which have not hearkened unto me." (Bp. Newcombe.) The reformation of the Jews after their return from Babylon might be alluded to; but the purification of the Christian Church from all antichristian corruptions of faith and worship, and all idolatry and superstition, seem more immediately to be predicted. The reliance on human merits for justification; the external pomp used in worship; and the oppressive exercise of human authority in mere matters of conscience, will be entirely destroyed by the clear light of divine truth and the power of divine grace; and simplicity and purity in doctrine, worship, and practice, will prevail, when the enemies of the Church shall be destroyed.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They who delight or excel in war often gather themselves against the Church of God: and sometimes they treat the most honourable and excellent of the saints, as the Judge of Israel and of the earth was treated in the days of his humiliation: but they cannot prevail against the cause that God upholds, nor prevent the accomplishment of his decrees. We should not then be impatient, or despond under any contumely or cruelty, which we meet with for his sake. We should look steadfastly to the divine glory of the Redeemer, "whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting;" and upon his condescending love to sinners, when he humbled himself to appear in our nature, and to become poor and a sufferer, that he might be our Prince and Saviour. and that by ruling over us he might confer the most invaluable blessings. A relation to him ennobles the meanest and enriches the poorest; and surely we shall not refuse to obey him, who hath a right to our services, purchased by his unspeakable sufferings for us, and immense obligations conferred on us! Great have been the effects of his redemption; yet his Church hath been left to struggle with various difficulties, and will

In the mean time let us trust to our Shepherd's care and power: he standeth as one intent upon his work, and feedeth his purchased flock with divine condescension, majesty, and authority; his very looks appal the wolves that would devour his harmless sheep, and they abide unhurt amidst their powerful and enraged enemies. How great and glorious ought his name to be throughout the earth! He is our peace, and having reconciled us to God by his blood, he giveth us inward peace in our outward tribulations. If he permit the assaults of our enemies, he will supply helpers and assistance sufficient for us; and all the power of every enemy shall fall before those shepherds and principal persons, whom he employs to maintain and propagate his truth and cause. As he employed the converted Jews, like dew and rain, to fructify the Gentile nations, so should we endeavour to be in our several places in his Church and in the world; aiming to glorify God, and expecting the blessing from him, and not waiting for men's solicitation to attempt their good, nor growing weary through their ingratitude. Yet the most beneficent, zealous, and useful Christians and ministers will prove the occasions of the deepest condemnation to obstinate unbelievers and enemies: and as their ruin will be attended with the purification of the Church from every error and defilement; so we shall be assured of victory in our personal conflicts, in proportion as we simply depend upon the Lord our salvation, worship him spiritually, and serve him with devoted diligence in all his ordinances and commandments.

faith, and holiness; and to consider the power, justice, truth, and goodness of him that appointed it: that they might discern how much it concerned them to take warning and obey his voice. 'He that is truly wise will easily discover God's authority in such a message.—'Wisdom in the Hebrew is put for the wise man.' (Lowth.) (Note, Prov. xviii. 1, 2.) The same word is rendered wisdom in the text referred to.

V. 10-15. After all warnings and corrections, the people continued to treasure up ill-gotten riches, and to practise all kinds of fraud, violence, and deceit. Therefore, the Lord determined to add to their miseries, till they were made sick, and ready to faint under his desolating judgments. They should be reduced to such scarcity, as to be unable to obtain a full meal: they should be cast down in the midst of the city, where they had lived secure and luxurious; and their miseries would be within them, as a wasting disease in the vitals; or as the falling of a building by reason of a decay of the foundation. All means of upholding or delivering them should prove vain and unsuccessful. And they should have the trouble of cultivating their fields, whilst others would seize on and enjoy their choicest productions. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. The idolatries, that had long before been established in Israel by Omri and his son Ahab and his family, were observed to the times of Micah, not only in Israel, but, as it seems, in some parts of Judah, as if of higher authority than the law of God; and their hateful maxims, counsels, and examples, were attended to. It was therefore proper, that the offenders should be exposed to contempt and desolation; and that they should bear reproach from the heathen as the worshippers of God, seeing they had acted so inconsistently with that character. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-3.

The ministers of God must be very earnest, faithful, and intrepid, in pleading his cause against his enemies: and when his controversy with his rebellious subjects, and especially with hypocrites, shall be openly decided, the whole creation will applaud his justice in their condemnation. The excellency of our God, the goodness of his laws, the grace of his Gospel, the pleasantness of his service, and the kindness of his providence, should all combine to make us ashamed of the negligence and inconstancy of our obedience: for we often act as if his service was wearisome, and we were disposed to renounce it. But were we called to speak, we could neither testify aught against him, nor urge any reasonable excuse for ourselves: nor can rebels or apostates in any measure justify themselves in departing from the living God. We should always remember the mercies that our progenitors have long ago received, and which tended to our advantage; and the oracles of God, and good teachers, rulers and examples, are to be valued among our greatest privileges. Could we know how often the Lord hath defeated the machinations of Satan and his servants against us, we should have abundant proof of his kindness, and of our own ingratitude; and this would show his righteousness in his sharpest corrections. Plain remonstrances, on this and similar subjects, tend to alarm men's consciences, and to show their need of coming before the most high God, to deprecate his wrath. In this frame of mind, they would do much, nay, almost any thing, to appease him and quiet their own consciences: but whilst they remain ignorant of the Gospel, or prejudiced against it, they will either rest in external ordinances and good behaviour, as a compound system of self-righteousness, or they will run into expensive, burdensome, and painful services, which God hath not commanded; nay, perhaps they will be seduced into an endeavour to please God by those things that are most atrocious and horrid. For if it were possible, in great terrors of conscience, men would present to the Lord ten thousand rivers of oil: and they have actually sought to expiate their guilt by the murder and massacre of heretics, by human sacrifices, and even by "giving their first-born, the fruit of their body, for the sin of their souls!" These practices must arise from mistaken apprehensions of the divine character; and are more suited to the worshippers of Satan, than to those of JEHOUAH. Blessed be his name, he hath in his word revealed to us a way of access, a propitiatory sacrifice, and a method of applying for its benefits, that are honourable to him, and admirably suited to

CHAP. VII.

The prophet complains of the decrease of godly men, and the iniquity of his people; and encourages himself to trust in God, 1-7. The church expects victory over her insulting foes, and deliverance from her afflictions, with renewed consolations and prosperity, 8-13. Prayers, and predictions of glorious times; with an exulting view of the unequalled mercy and truth of God towards his people, 14-30.

3 That they may do evil with both hands earnestly, the prince asketh, and the judge asketh for a reward; and the great man, he uttereth his mischievous desire: so they wrap it up.

our case. And would we show the sincerity of our repentance, faith, and love, he requires nothing from us, but to "do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with our God;" for, notwithstanding our manifold failures, even in this return of grateful obedience, he is ever ready to renew his pardons, and to communicate his grace to the humble waiting penitent.

V. 9-16.

In order that sinners may receive instruction, the Lord calls them by the voice of his word and by that of his providence: in these the wise behold his glory and read his character; they hear the correcting rod speak to them of the evil of sin, and their need of repentance; they learn the lessons that he teacheth, and call others to attend, and to consider who hath appointed their afflictions, that they may not murmur or despond, but derive good from them. But if this voice be disregarded, the sword of vengeance will be drawn: for so bent is man on wickedness, that amidst all judgments and warnings he is apt to proceed in covetous, fraudulent, or oppressive endeavours to grow rich, or in various ways to multiply lies and deceit. Thus heavier sufferings are ensured, the satisfaction of outward mercies is marred, and the wrath of God may be expected to corrode the inmost soul; nor can there be deliverance, except by repentance, faith, and renewed obedience. But, alas! men are much more ready to observe and cleave to iniquitous and ungodly laws, counsels, and maxims, than to walk in the good ways of the Lord; and when this is the case with his professing people, they may expect a double portion of misery and contempt.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1-4. This description of the wickedness of the people, especially in Judah, has been thought inconsistent with the times of Hezekiah: and it hath therefore been considered as prophetic of the wicked reign of Manasseh. But perhaps the prophet witnessed such scenes towards the close of Hezekiah's reign, as caused him dolefully to presage the ensuing apostacy. He lamented that after all his zealous labours he could find very few pious persons: but was like a man that went into an orchard or vineyard, after the fruit had been gathered; and, instead of satisfying himself with the first ripe fruit, which was most valued and plentiful, could not find a single cluster of grapes, but only a few gleanings of inferior goodness. He longed to live among eminent believers, but he found very few that had any sense of piety, and these were far inferior to their pious ancestors. For good and merciful men were taken to heaven, and the land was deprived of them, till an upright person could scarcely be found. (Marg. Ref.) In general they sought to enrich themselves, by murdering or ruining their neighbours; even as hunters pursue their game into the net. They were exceedingly diligent and active in mischief, doing it "with both hands earnestly," or effectually. They excelled in doing evil, with great diligence and ability. The prince, or magistrate, asked a bribe for perverting justice; and the rich oppressor had only to mention the mischief he purposed; and so the bargain was concluded, and they covered up the infamous transaction. The best of them were entangling and mischievous as briars; and created more pain and trouble to such as had dealings with them, than a thorn-hedge to those that attempted to force through it: the worst of them therefore must be serpents, or wolves and tigers. No doubt then could remain, but that the day of visitation, predicted by all Israel's watchmen, was at hand, when they would be reduced to the most perplexing straits.

stroyed: though foiled, we are not slain; and ought therefore to resume our arms, and renew the combat. Our darkness, through temptation, tribulation, or persecution, will not long prevent our comfort in the Lord, our Light and Salvation. Though we have often and grievously sinned, and are suffering under the rod of his fatherly displeasure, yet we may unite hope in his mercy with submission to his correction; for he will at length plead our cause, and bring us forth to the light, clear our characters from slanderous imputations, and fulfil to us his faithful promises: so that all, who have derided our confidence in God, because of difficulties and distresses, shall be covered with shame; and those that hate us, for his sake, shall be trodden down as the mire in the streets.

No hinderances can obstruct the intended favours of God to his Church or servants: and their returning peace and comfort allure others to come and join themselves to them.

Let us then continue in prayer to the Lord, that he would graciously feed his dispersed flock: his heritage, that dwell "in the world, but are not of it;" and that he would support us and our brethren under all disconsolations and trials, and make us joyful in him, as his people were in days of old. Then will he hear our prayers and renew his ancient wonders, and make us victorious over every opposer; and at length all his enemies and those of his Church shall be filled with terror, and have their portion with the old serpent, the tempter and murderer of mankind. Let us then rejoice, and praise the pardoning mercy of our God; let us hope and pray that he will turn to us, and turn us to himself; that he will have compassion on us, and subdue, as well as forgive, our sins, and fully and finally deliver us from these our inward and most dangerous foes. Let us rely on the mercy and truth, engaged by covenant and oath to Abraham and all his believing children; and remember that the Lord hath given this infallible security, for "the strong consolation of all those that have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before them" in Christ Jesus.

BOOK OF NAHUM.

It is probably conjectured, that Nahum delivered this prophecy about the time when Sennacherib invaded Judah. It relates almost entirely to the destruction of Nineveh and of the Assyrian empire, of which the cutting off of Sennacherib's army was an earnest and presage; and its primary intent seems to have been the encouragement of the pious Jews, amidst the troubles and alarms occasioned by that invasion — It does not appear, that this short prophecy is referred to in the New Testament: yet it certainly formed a part of that volume which Christ and his apostles called "the Scriptures," "the oracles of God" No other prediction is clearly contained in it, but that of the desolations of Nineveh; 'that vast and populous city, whose walls were an hundred feet high, and capable of admitting three chariots abreast upon them, and fortified with fifteen hundred towers, in walls of two hundred feet high!—So totally, indeed, was this city destroyed, that in the second century after Christ not a vestige remained of it, to ascertain the spot on which it stood. Its situation has long been a matter of doubt and uncertainty.' (Note, iii. 19.) 'This remarkable prophecy, thus remarkably accomplished, affords a signal evidence of the inspiration of Nahum, and a striking lesson of humility to human pride' (Gray's Key.) The best judges are agreed, that, in respect of arrangement, style, and sublimity, it is one of the most finished poems extant in human language.

CHAP. I. V. 1. Jonah had long before preached to the Ninevites, and their repentance had for the time averted the threatened vengeance: but as they relapsed into idolatry and wickedness, and were become most cruel enemies to God's people, Nahum had a vision of terrible destruction that was coming upon them, which he wrote in a book, and as some think sent to them. (Notes, Jer. xxxiii. 33—40.) His name signifies a comforter, and this prediction would comfort the afflicted Jews. He was called the Elkoshite, from Elkosh in Galilee, the place of his birth or habitation, as it is supposed;

CHAP. II.

Predictions of the siege and taking of Ni-

V. 14. The Lord had given orders that Sennacherib's army should be cut off; but he himself was reserved for execution by the hands of his own sons. Esarhaddon his son, indeed, succeeded him, and reigned prosperously many years: but the Assyrian empire was subverted soon after, and probably that family was extinct, at least their power was annihilated; and no more of that seed was permitted to be sown or to grow upon the earth. The idols also of Nineveh were about to be extirpated: the graves of the city, the empire, and the royal family, were preparing; and because they were vile in their conduct they would be very greatly debased. 'The house of thy idol shall become thy grave, when thou shalt be dishonourably slain by thy own sons; it is a just punishment of thy blasphemy against the God of Israel.' (Louth.)

V. 15. (Marg. Ref.) Messengers would be sent from Jerusalem into the distant parts of the land, to carry the welcome tidings of the destruction of Sennacherib's army; and of the peace of Jerusalem and Judah; and to invite the Jews to come and celebrate their solemn feasts, and to pay their vows at the temple for their deliverance. They might then do it safely; for the Assyrian tyrant would no more pass through to ravage the land, his power being utterly cut off. This may be considered as typical of the future destruction of the enemies of the Church, which will make way for the universal preaching of the Gospel, and for the peace and felicity of believers,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The scriptural character of our glorious God does not accord to the imaginations and sentiments of proud reasoners on that subject: for, admiring their own supposed excellencies, they form notions of God conformable to them, and thus admire and worship an ideal deity. But "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies," is also "jealous, and revengeth;" and executeth most terrible punishments on those, who rebel against his authority, oppose his truth, or persecute his people. He is indeed slow to wrath, and ready to forgive the penitent and believing: but he will by no means acquit the wicked; and he reserveth "tribulation and anguish for every soul of man that doeth evil." But who regardeth the power of his wrath? When he shall arise to execute vengeance on his enemies, the whole creation will tremble, and melt or be consumed with fervent heat: and all things will concur in augmenting the dismay and destruction of the ungodly. "Who then will be able to stand before his indignation, or to abide the fierceness of his anger, when his fury shall be poured out like fire, and the rocks and mountains shall be thrown down by him?" What will it then avail the condemned criminal to reflect, that he hath amused himself and others by specious reasonings against the awful justice, holiness, and vengeance of his offended Sovereign; and soothed conscience into a delusive peace by vain speculations? But a believing apprehension of the goodness and mercy of God, as consisting with his perfect justice through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, and a reliance on him for pardon and peace, induce a well-grounded confidence and assurance. They that come in this way to trust in the Lord will find him their Strong-hold and impregnable Fortress, in every time of trouble and danger; and he will make it appear that he approved and favoured them; whilst his enemies shall be carried away as with a flood into the blackness of darkness and despair. For they that imagine evil against God, and his truth and cause, will be utterly destroyed: and their mischievous combinations and intoxicating revels will prepare them as thorns folded together, or as dry stubble for the fire of his wrath; nor will their multitudes, their confidence, their sagacity, or abilities, in the least secure them. For a time indeed the Lord employs such men to scourge his offending children, and to winnow the corn of his floor: but he will soon break off their yoke, terminate their power, and forbid them any more to afflict his Church. All idols and idolaters, and all the vile and abominable of the earth, will soon be buried in the grave that the Lord is preparing for them; and then Zion shall rejoice and celebrate her solemn feasts, and pay her vows, and never more be troubled with the wicked passing through her. Let us then rejoice in the glad tidings and peace of the Gospel: let us gladly attend on sacred ordinances, as the sacred feasts of our souls: let us remember to pay the vows that we made in the day of our distress and trouble: and so look forward with cheerful hope to our admission into that world, whither the wicked never can enter, and where sin and temptation will no more be known.

V. 11-13. The kings of Assyria had long been terrible, powerful, and cruel to their neighbours, like lions to the beasts of the forest, or of the pasture. Their successful wars enriched and advanced their families, and supported them in the most luxurious and magnificent manner. But what was become of this lion's den? Of Nineveh, that mighty city? The Lord, being against the wickedness of their kings, would certainly consume their power, destroy their posterity, spoil them of their prey, and silence the voice of their ambassadors, whom they sent to insult, menace, and exact upon the conquered nations; or to blaspheme God and revile his people, as Rabshakeh had done. And then the nations would rejoice at their fall. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

What delight have men in every age taken in dashing others in pieces, though by exposing themselves to similar destruction!—The event of the cruel contests of proud mortals for power, renown, or wealth, is entirely ordered by the just and holy God; who sometimes employs them to correct his people, and at other times to execute vengeance on oppressors and murderers. The consideration of the horrors and miseries of war should make us thankful, for the blessings of peace, and excite us to pray for the continuance of them. Yet we ought always to be prepared for troubles, for we know not how soon they may arrive. We should then be careful not to contract habits of effeminacy, delicacy, or self-indulgence; for these disqualify men for enduring hardship, and render poverty or captivity doubly terrible. We ought also to beware of covetousness, ostentation, and magnificence: for what will treasures or glory do for us, in the seasons of extreme distress, or in the day of wrath? Yet, in making such acquisitions for themselves or their families, how many lose their souls! We should use power or prosperity with gentleness and moderation; for selfishness, arrogance, and inhumanity, expose men to the wrath of God, and the hatred of their neighbours also. If the Lord be against any persons or nations, they must soon be rendered miserable, and sink into silence and darkness. Let us then come to him upon his mercy-seat, that, having peace with him through our Lord Jesus Christ, we may know that he is for us, and that all things shall work together for our everlasting good.

NOTES.

V. 2, 3. 'Vengeance is near thee: I do already hear the noise of the Babylonian whips, in the hands of the charioteers, driving furiously against thee. (Bp. Hall.)—'The flame of the sword, and the lightning of the spear, &c.' (Bp. Newcombe.) The passage is peculiarly poetical.
V. 4-6. The idolatries and sorceries of Nineveh, and that licentiousness with which they were attended, and the captivating methods by which the Assyrians brought other nations to submit to their authority, or to unite in their idolatries and iniquities, are here assigned as the reasons of the Lord's determination to expose them to the greatest ignominy and misery imaginable: in the same manner as they had utterly disregarded the welfare of whole nations, and given them to be spoiled and ruined without remorse. Israel and Judah especially had been thus treated by them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7. 'If we seek for any mourners over departed Nineveh, none will be found, every one rejoicing over her destruction.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8-11. Populous No, or, No-Ammon. (Marg.) No-Ammon, in Egypt, concerning the situation of which learned men are not agreed, seems to have been desolated, in the manner here described, a short time before this prophecy was delivered: some think that Sennacherib had just taken and destroyed it. It had been very populous, situated in a very fertile soil, and fortified by nature and art in an almost impregnable manner. As an Ethiopian then reigned over Egypt, the immense forces of these two kingdoms were combined for its defence, together with the assistance of the Libyans and Mauritians, and other nations of Africa: yet was the city taken, and its inhabitants carried captive, after the most shocking cruelties had been exercised upon numbers of them, and even upon their infants; whilst their most honourable men were divided by lot among the conquerors as slaves, and so led away in chains. And were the inhabitants of Nineveh better than those of No, or more likely to be preserved from such a ruin? By no means: on the contrary, they would be infatuated with prosperity, or stupified by excess or calamity; they would hide themselves within their walls, and look out in vain for assistance against their besiegers.

V. 12. Fig-trees. 'The image, though a common one, is very lively and expressive.' (Sp. Newcombe.)

V. 14. Go, &c. That is, make bricks and prepare mortar, in order to erect new fortifications, if possible, to repel the enemy.

V. 15-17. 'Whilst thou art repairing the old fortifications, or making new ones, the enemy shall set thy works on fire. The sword of thine enemies, who shall be as numerous and destructive as locusts or canker-worms, shall destroy thee.' 'As the locusts destroy the fruits of the earth, and fly away to another place; so shall thy soldiers pillage all the wealth thou hast gained by traffic, and then leave thee.' (Lowth.) Nineveh, by commerce, became extremely populous: but the number of her traders, when the city was besieged would consume her provisions, as caterpillars waste the land. Perhaps mercenary soldiers are meant, who having devoured the produce of the country, fled or deserted to the enemy, when their help was wanted. Even their tributary kings, or most honourable captains, would resemble locusts, that remove when the sun grows hot; for they would abide with them whilst danger was distant, but would be gone when the enemy approached. 'The tributary princes deserted Nineveh in the day of her distress.' (Herodotus.) 'Diodorus Siculus, speaking of the siege in which Nineveh fell, says, When the enemy shut up the king in the city many nations revolted, each going over to the besiegers for the sake of their liberty; that the king dispatched messengers to all his subjects, requiring forces from them, to assist him; and that he thought himself able to endure a siege, and remained in expectation of the armies, which were to be raised throughout the empire: relying on an oracle, that the city could not be taken, till the river became its enemy.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 18. The rulers of Assyria were become supine, self-indulgent, and negligent, or they would be disheartened and debased; and they would be slain and left upon the ground; while the people were scattered as lost sheep, without any to seek after them.

V. 19. Upon, &c. Nineveh had corrupted, or oppressed by her wickedness, all the surrounding nations, continually during many ages: therefore all the nations would rejoice at her fall. The obsolete word bruit signifies report. The entire desolation of Nineveh is in this prophecy most expressly and particularly foretold: yet no event can be imagined more improbable, at the time when Nahum wrote, than this was. The entire desolation of London, so that none could decide where this great metropolis was situated, would not be considered by us as more improbable, than the desolations of Nineveh must have appeared at that day; when it was the greatest, and most populous and powerful, city in the known world. Yet, when conquered by the kings of Babylon, who transferred the seat of empire to the city which they had built for their own glory, Nineveh was deserted by its inhabitants, and left to moulder into ruins; and within two hundred years after the coming of Christ, no trace remained of this vast capital of the Assyrian empire! And now it is not agreed, either among learned men or travellers, or the inhabitants of those regions, where Nineveh stood! some even place it on the Euphrates. But of those who agree that it stood on the Tigris, some place it on one side, some on the other, of that river; and some higher up, and some nearer the sea, by many miles. I do not say, that these discordant opinions are alike probable; for most well informed and competent judges would perhaps nearly agree, except as to the exact spot where the city stood: yet the very circumstance, of so many discordant opinions, is the completest proof imaginable that the prediction has been most wonderfully accomplished; and that it was delivered by the inspiration of that God, “unto whom are all his works, from the beginning of the “ world.”

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Very flourishing cities are often full of lies and robbery, of fraud and injustice; and in general they are contaminated with blood, shed in massacres, persecutions, oppression of dependent provinces, or iniquitous war: and by these means the prey is accumulated, and departeth not till the Lord constrains them to make restitution: but he will recompense the crimes of such cities and kingdoms, and pour out the blood of those who are lavish of the blood of others. — Too often they resemble well-favoured harlots; and disseminate far and wide their impiety, infidelity, licentiousness and vice; and the nations are corrupted by their example, or enslaved to support their grandeur and luxury, or to gratify their avarice and ambition. The Lord will surely express his abhorrence of such politics and practices; and will turn the glory of such cities into shame, and make them vile, and as a gazing stock to others. Thus Nineveh, Babylon, Tyre, and many others, have been reduced and ruined, that they might be a warning to us; even as No was to Nineveh. — And what better are we, than these ancient cities or kingdoms? except as there is a remnant of true Christians among us, who are a greater security and a stronger rampart to us, than all our advantages of situation; than our fleets, armies, or allies, even though our strength should appear to be infinite. In these respects we are not superior to the cities and empires that have been mentioned: and the multitude of the nation are equally wicked, amid vastly superior advantages for being holy. When the Lord shows himself against a people, their enemies have an easy victory, and power to destroy their children, or enslave their nobles and honourable men. Then their strong-holds are taken upon the first assault; their valiant soldiers become as women; their efforts are unsuccessful, their confederates treacherous, their helpers the immediate causes of their ruin: and every confidence must fail, till their wounds become grievous and incurable; and all, on whom their wickedness hath passed continually, will rejoice and exult at their fall. Thus will it at length happen to all the enemies of God: but he continues good to Israel, a Strong-hold in every time of trouble, that cannot be stormed and taken; and “ he knoweth them that “ trust in him.”

BOOK OF HABAKKUK.

The absurd and contradictory legends of the Jewish writers concerning this prophet, are not worthy of notice, except as they show how little dependence can be placed on such witnesses. Some pretend that he was the son of the Shunamitish woman, whom Elisha restored to life! While others, (especially the apocryphal book of Bel and the dragon;) introduce him as feeding Daniel in the den of lions, just before the return of the Jews from Babylon. It is, however, plain that he prophesied before the captivity, and probably about the close of Josiah's reign, and the beginning of Jehoikim's, being contemporary with Jeremiah. 'Habakkuk stands high in the class of the Hebrew poets. The beautiful connexion 'between the parts of this prophecy; its diction, imagery, spirit, and sublimity, cannot be too much 'admired' (Bp. Newcombe.) He is repeatedly quoted as an inspired writer in the New Testament. (Comp. i. 5. with Acts xiii. 10, 41. and ii. 3, 4. with Rom. i. 17. Gal. iii. 11. Heb. x. 37, 38.) and his predictions of the devastations made by the Chaldeans, and the judgments to be inflicted on them, are generally considered as including the temporary success and final ruin of the oppressors and corrupters of the Christian Church, and the final and universal prevalence of true religion throughout the earth. — Nahum foretold the destruction of the Assyrians, who carried the ten tribes captive; — Habakkuk foretells the judgments that should come on the Chaldeans, who completed the captivity of the remaining 'tribes.' (Lowth.) — The prophet begins with complaints of the wickedness of his people, and then proceeds to predict the Chaldean invasion and its terrible effects. He bewails the successful wickedness of the invaders; gives encouragement to God's people, and denounces judgments on his enemies: and he concludes with celebrating, in the highest strains of sublime poetry, the ancient wonders that the Lord had wrought for Israel, in order to excite confidence and joy in him, in the prospect of approaching calamities.

there are those which raise up strife and contention against me.' (Bp. Hull.) It appears, that the prophet had long lamented the abounding and increasing wickedness of his people, and prayed that God would put some effectual stop to it: but it continued to prevail, and he was tempted to conclude that his prayers were disregarded. He also complained, that the Lord constrained him to behold violence and iniquity; whilst the poor were crushed and cruelly plundered by the powerful. He inquired why his lot was cast in such evil times, that he was forced to dwell among robbers and oppressors, and to witness discords and virulent contentions? These things were become so common, and the rulers were so addicted to bribery, that the law lay dormant, and the execution of it was entirely relaxed; so that wicked men circumvented and defrauded the righteous with impunity; for either no sentence could be obtained, or it proved an iniquitous decision. Such was the wretched condition of Judah; and it was the consequence of idolatry, impiety, or hypocrisy in religion.

V. 5. In answer to the prophet's complaint, the Lord showed him that the Chaldeans would speedily execute vengeance on the Jews. They were, therefore, warned to give peculiar attention to the events which took place among the heathen, by the victories of the Chaldeans; or to consider themselves as one of the nations that were to be scourged by them: or they were reminded that they would wonder with great astonishment, when scattered among the heathen, at the accomplishment of those predictions, which at present they disregarded. For they would not believe that God would work such a work, at least in their days and by the Chaldeans, though God himself informed them, by his prophets, that he certainly would. The application of this by St. Paul to the Jews in his days, evinces that the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans was an emblem, or anticipation, of the calamities that came on the nation for rejecting the Gospel. (Acts xiii. 41.) The apostle quoted the passage from the Septuagint, rather than from the original text: yet the quotation does not exactly accord to either. The Greek translators seem to have read Begadim, or, despisers, instead of Bugovim, among the heathen. This, with another trivial variation, gives nearly the rendering of the passage, as it stands in the Acts. The meaning is not materially different: and it is not necessary to decide which is the true reading.

—In your days. Hence it follows, that the Chaldeans invaded Judea, while those were living whom the prophet addressed.' (Bp. Newcomb.) As Jerusalem was destroyed within less than thirty years from the death of Josiah; and as the Chaldeans were not, till about that time, very formidable among the nations: it may be probably conjectured, that Habakkuk delivered this prophecy about the end of Josiah's reign, or soon after his death; and that the circumstance of the obscure Chaldeans, rather than the renowned Assyrians, being appointed to accomplish it, conduced to harden the people in unbelief.

V. 6. Bitter, &c. That is, fierce, cruel, and impetuous, bearing all down before them, regardless of the miseries which they occasioned.

V. 7. The decisions and regulations of the Chaldeans, would be framed entirely according to their own caprice, and to confirm their own authority, without any regard to the good of the people: they would consider their prosperity and dignity as proceeding from their own courage and conduct, and glory in them on that ground; and they would not consider themselves as accountable to any superior for their use of them.

V. 8. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. Shall sup, &c. That is, they would devour all before them, as the unwholesome east wind blasts and withers the productions of the earth. (Marg. Ref.)—Some render the words, "Whatsoever they gather, they shall carry it toward the east," meaning to Babylon. (Louth.)

V. 10. The Hebrew uses the singular number here, as in the following verse; and is to be understood of the king of Babylon, who conquered kings and princes, and treated them with scorn and contempt. So he used Zedekiah and his princes, &c. (Louth.) (Ez. xxv. & xxxii.)

V. 11. The rapid and uninterrupted success of the king of Babylon against the Jews and the adjacent nations, would intoxicate him with arrogance, and cause him to pass all bounds of reason, moderation, or decency, in his oppression and impieties ; and he would greatly offend the Lord, who had prospered his undertaking, by imputing his success to his idol Belus, or Nebo. This may refer to the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar set up; and to his extraordinary insanity, which was the punishment and cure of his pride; and perhaps Belshazzar's arrogance and blasphemy also might be alluded to, which preceded the ruin of the Chaldean monarchy, and the deliverance of the Jews from captivity. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12—17. The prophet again poured out his complaints before God, in the prospect of the dreadful calamities which were coming on his people from the Chaldeans. He had hoped, that the Lord would reform the nation by gentler corrections, or by raising up eminent instruments for that work: but when he understood the heavy judgments to be inflicted upon them, he was grieved, even as he had been by witnessing their crimes; he was astonished, that God would punish his offending worshippers by so wicked and idolatrous a people as the Chaldeans: and he still hoped that he would not finally leave them in their hands. As an Israelite, and as representing that nation, he addressed God, the everlasting JEHOVAH, his God, his eternal and unchangeable Portion, and the glorious Object of his adoration; "his Holy One," who was perfect in justice, truth, goodness, and purity: he was therefore assured that he and his people should not die, or be utterly cut off by their enemies. The Lord had indeed ordained and established the Chaldeans in power, to judge his people, to distinguish betwixt hypocrites and believers, to punish the one, to correct the other for their good, and thus to reform the nation. But he was of purer eyes, than to behold iniquity without abhorrence; and therefore he would by no means countenance injustice, treachery, or tyranny. Why then would he look on, and keep silence, as an unconcerned spectator, whilst these wicked idolaters devoured those that were more righteous than themselves? Why did he so prosper the cruel and rapacious, as to enable them to prey upon their inferiors, as the sea-monsters and large fishes do upon the multitude of the smaller fishes; or as reptiles are destroyed by more powerful creatures, having none to rule over or protect them? Indeed, men became the prey of their own species, as fishes are taken by the fishermen, without being able to make any effectual resistance; whilst some were drawn out by the angle, others by the cast-net or the draw-net. Thus the victorious Chaldeans would prey upon the helpless Jews, and rejoice in their miseries and their own successful wickedness; and ascribe their victories to means and instruments, to their sword, courage, and conduct, by which they lived in plenty and luxury; and not to the living God, who alone giveth men power to grow rich and great. And this would increase their propensity to vain glory or vain idolatry; in which they would act as absurdly, as if the fisherman should offer sacrifice or burn incense to his net, when he had taken a large draught of fishes, or grew rich by his occupation. But would the Lord permit them thus to gather and hoard up wealth by fraud and rapine, and to destroy whole nations, (especially his own nation,) to aggrandize themselves?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

The servants of God cannot but be greatly afflicted, by witnessing the prevalence of ungodliness, iniquity, violence, and contention; especially among those that profess the truth. This will excite their earnest cries; and it will often cause them to complain, that the Lord delays to hear their prayers and to prosper their labours, and constrains them to stand by while his law is despised and trampled on, the laws of men are slackened or perverted, and the wicked are allowed to compass about the righteous, and to ruin him by iniquitous judgments. But sometimes their prayers and complaints are answered in a way of which they were not aware; and the Lord lifts up a standard against the incursions of impiety, by meeting them with desolating judgments. Even when he gives warning that this is his purpose, few to whom it is told will believe it. Most men presume upon continued prosperity, or that calamities will not come in their days: so that when predicted judgments overwhelm guilty nations or individuals, "they marvellously wonder," as if no intimation had been given about them! But when the Lord has work of this kind to do, he can soon raise up bitter and hasty instruments, to desolate countries, and seize upon dwelling-places that are not theirs; men whose pride and arrogance are as terrible as their cruelty and fierceness. Their valour, speed, and success, are from God: but their barbarity, rapacity, and treachery, and the abuse of their power and dignity, are of themselves. These influence them to ravage nations, to destroy or enslave millions, to deride and scorn princes, and to take pleasure in mischief and devastation. And whilst the Lord employs and prospers them in executing his judgments, they grow more intoxicated by success, and more hardened in impiety, infidelity, and idolatry; and thus ripen themselves for destruction.

V. 12—17.

The everlasting and holy Lord God of Israel, though he ordains the basest of men for correction and judgment, continues the invariable Friend of his people; and though he “ chasten them sore, he will not give them over unto death.” He is “ of purer eyes than to behold iniquity:” and as he will not connive at or countenance the crimes of his worshippers, or even the incongruous walking of true believers, so he cannot possibly approve of the enormous injustice, treachery, cruelty, rapacity, or blasphemy, of his enemies. Yet the transient success of bad men, in devouring those that are more righteous than themselves, often proves a dangerous temptation to believers; and causes them to question, for the time, the truth of their own principles, and to be dissatisfied with their choice and Portion. But this is their infirmity: and prayer for stronger faith and for clearer views of eternal things is their proper remedy. It is lamentably true, that men are like the fishes of the sea, and the ungoverned and animal tribes, which devour each other, and are “ made to be taken and destroyed.” The havoc of the human species by mighty conquerors and cruel tyrants, to enrich and aggrandize themselves, and the constant re-acting of this same bloody tragedy, on one stage after another, all over the earth, through successive generations, with the loud plaudits of the numerous and admiring spectators, form one of the most mortifying reflections imaginable to the pious and humane observer. Yet the Lord hath wise reasons for permitting these things; though he abhors not only the injustice and cruelty of the actors, but also their impiety and self-admiration, whilst they ascribe their greatness and prosperity to their own policy, courage, or good fortune, and rejoice in their fleeting riches and fading glories: and he will soon end their successful and splendid robberies. Death and judgment shall make them cease to prey on others, and they themselves shall be preyed upon. But let us remember, whatever temporal or spiritual advantages we possess, by whatever means, instruments, or endeavours, to give all the glory of them to God, with humble thanksgivings and praises. Thus all things will be sanctified to us, lead our thoughts to the great Source of all felicity, and help to prepare us for the enjoyment of his favour for ever.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1—3. The prophet, having made his complaints and inquiries before God, humbly waited for an answer. He was a watchman, who was appointed to stand in his watch-tower, to give warning of the approach either of enemies or helpers. He would therefore wait upon God with recollection and prayer, expecting further instructions: and he would watch to see what the Lord would say to him, or “ in him,” by the Spirit of prophecy, that he might know what to answer to the people; who reproved him and contended with him for uttering the terrifying predictions of the foregoing chapter, and who started objections which he knew not how to obviate. Accordingly, the Lord ordered him to write the following vision in large legible characters, upon tables made of wood and covered with wax, (as was customary in those days;) that being hung up in some public place, every one might read it with the utmost facility; and that the Jews might generally get acquainted with it. For it related to interesting events which would not immediately be fulfilled; but for which a time was appointed in the purposes of God. When that period should arrive, the prophecy would speak for itself, proclaiming its divine original by its exact accomplishment: this therefore was to be patiently waited for, though apparently long delayed; for it would infallibly come to pass, and not tarry beyond the prescribed and best time. Some interpret this of the coming of Christ, and render it, He will surely come, &c. (Heb. x. 37, 38.)

When I am, &c. “ What I shall answer, as to what I have argued;” viz. ‘ to the expostulations I made with God just before. God commands the prophet to write the contents of this vision, in such visible characters as were used in public tables, and hung up in temples and market-places, that every one might have cognizance of them.’

Though it tarry, &c. ‘ There are two words in the Hebrew rendered by one English word, tarry. Though he tarry, expect him; because he that cometh, will

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-8.

(Marg. Ref.) It may therefore predict the pains, which the king and people of Babylon would take to tempt the nations, especially the Jews, to idolatry, or to debase them by oppression; and the judgments of God upon them for it; in which they typified the church of Rome, the great seducer of Christians to idolatry and superstition, and the persecutor of the Church, which shall soon receive its righteous retribution. The Chaldeans would thus be punished " for the violence of Lebanon," that is, say some, ' for
 ' the violence done to the temple built of cedars of Leba' non;' or for the ravages committed near that mountain; or rather for the cruelties, by which they resembled the wild beasts which frequented it. " Therefore the spoil of " beasts shall make them afraid;" ' as thou hast spoiled
 " others, without any sense of common humanity: so the " army of the conqueror shall deal with thee, and shall " tear thee in pieces as wild beasts do their prey,' (Lowth.) and " the spoil of beasts," &c. or as men pursue and destroy beasts of prey upon the mountains, who have made them afraid by their depredations. They would suffer for men's blood that they had shed, and for the violence done to Judah, Jerusalem, and the Jews.

Cup. ' Grotius justly observes that the fifteenth and ' sixteenth verses contain an allegory. The Chaldeans ' gave to the neighbouring nations the cup of idolatry, and ' deceitful alliance; and in return they received from
 ' JEHOVAH the cup of his fury.' (Bp. Newcome.)

V. 18, 19. The idols of Babylon could not profit their makers: they were teachers of lies, leading men to false conceptions of God and the nature of his worship; their oracles, as interpreted by the priests, were unprofitable and pernicious lies; and the whole deluded men into an absurd confidence in a dumb idol, the work of their own hands. A woe was therefore denounced against those who continued so stupid and perverse, as to say to a log of wood, or block of marble, formed into any shape, by the saw, plane, or chisel, " Awake, arise, come, help, teach, " counsel us;" when, though it was overlaid with gold and silver, and appeared very splendid, yet being lifeless, it was actually inferior to the meanest reptile. This is certainly applicable to the idolatry of the New Testament-Babylon. For her example, influence, and authority, diffused the worship of angels, saints, and images, throughout the Christian Church, which hath continued in many places to this day; and probably will do, till that city shall be destroyed, and " swept with the besom of destruction," as ancient Babylon hath been.

V. 20. Opposed to these false and imaginary objects of worship, JEHOVAH was here revealed, as dwelling in his sanctuary among his people; that is, in Christ, in his Church, and amidst his worshippers, in heaven and earth.
 ' The true God has his throne in heaven,—whence he

When we have presented our prayers before God, we should expect and wait for an answer; using every means of information, and watching the course of providence; that we may learn his will, and how to answer those who cavil, object, or revile our confidence in him, and our belief of his word. Ministers also must wait upon God, to know how to answer their opposers; as well as watch for opportunities of usefulness. It behooves them to render their important message as plain and energetic as possible; that it may be level to the capacity of the most unlearned, and may excite the attention of the most heedless. For all men are concerned in the truths of God's word: all his predictions, promises, and threatenings, shall in the appointed season be accomplished; every part shall then declare its own truth and divinity; and they, who wait for the Lord, will not complain of having waited in vain.
 We should rest on and plead his promises; and though the performance of them 'arry, we should " hope unto the " end;" and we shall thus experience their truth and preciousness. But pride objects to this method of seeking happiness, and to the whole system of revealed religion:
 the ambitious, self-wise, and self-sufficient are not, and cannot be, upright in heart in their religious inquiries and professions; and by rejecting and despising the " righ" teousness of God by faith," they evince their insincerity.
 The humble broken-hearted sinner alone believes this report; he submits to God; he fears, hopes, waits, prays, and uses every means of obtaining an interest in this free salvation. He rests his soul on the promise, and on Christ, through whom it is given: thus he obtains righteousness and strength, wisdom and grace; he walks and works, as well as lives, by faith; perseveres unto the end, and is exalted to glory, whilst proud pharisees and hypocrites are debased unto hell. But in what varied ways does human depravity break forth! A vain exorbitant ambition disposes men to despise the most eligible situations, and to rove from home in quest of happiness: success only enlarges their desires, and renders them insatiable and boundless; and

The prophet prays that God would revive his work, and have mercy on his people, 1, 2. He commemorates the displays made of JEHOVAH's glory in his ancient works for Israel, as encouraging hope of future deliverances, 3—15. He shows how deeply he was affected by the prospect of the approaching judgments; but resolves to rejoice in God when all other comforts failed, 16—19.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. "A prayer of Habakkuk the prophet, with an Ode." (Sept.) "Shigionoth may denote a musical instrument of great compass, with which the Jews accompanied this piece of poetry." (Bp. Newcombe.) Marg. Ref.) The word prayer seems to be taken generally for an act of devotion to God.

V. 2. The prophet had hearkened attentively to the discovery, which the Lord had made to him of his future dealings with Israel: and though heavy judgments had been denounced on their oppressors, and intimations of future deliverances had been given, yet there was no reason to hope that the threatened judgments on Israel might be averted or retarded. He was therefore alarmed at the prospect of the captivity; and prayed that God would revive his work among them in the midst of those years of adversity, and make known his glorious perfections and his favour for his people, by preserving them, and purifying them in this furnace of affliction, that they might be prepared for deliverance from it; and that even in the midst of his wrath against them he would remember mercy also, and give them some mitigation of their calamities, and revive true religion among them. This seems primarily to refer to the years of the Babylonish captivity, though it may be applied to the years that were to intervene before the coming of the Messiah; to those of the antichristian oppressors of the Church; or to any other season when the Church is under divine rebukes or grievous afflictions.

V. 3—5. The prophet, (to encourage his hope of effectual help from God in behalf of the people, set himself to celebrate the praises of his former intercessions in their behalf. As Israel's "Holy One," the Object of their worship, and their righteous Ruler and Protector, he had come from Teman, or mount Seir, and from Paran, to the wretched slaves of them would be as far from felicity as ever, could they obtain the whole earth for their possession. Thus they multiply crimes, enemies, and dangers: they fall under the wo denounced against those who "increase that which is not theirs;" and their short-lived encumbrance defiles their souls, and excites others to rise up, vex, and make a booty of them, in their turn: and to avenge on them the blood that they have shed.

V. 9—20.

In vain do men expect, by "an evil covetousness," to advance their families and secure them from the power of evil: they only treasure up guilt and shame for them; and every part of their treasures amassed by fraud or violence, will cry out for vengeance on them. For were a man thus to build a city or erect a kingdom for his posterity, he would leave them a curse instead of a blessing; and he in acquiring, and they in attempting to preserve it, would labour in the fire, and weary themselves for very vanity. For the Lord will assuredly glorify himself before all the inhabitants of the earth, in executing judgment upon the murderers and plunderers of mankind, under whatever specious guise they make their appearance. Nor can sensual pleasures do more for men's happiness than avarice or ambition: whilst they transgress by wine, and tempt others to that degrading vice, and glory in making their neighbours drunken also, that they may cheat or deride them; they forget, that God hath denounced a wo upon them, and that the cup of his wrath is about to be put into their hands, which will turn all their mirth into howling, and all their glory into contempt. Indeed, all who seduce others into any kind of carnal or spiritual wickedness, to gratify their own vile passions or interests, will meet with the severest condemnation from the Lord. Nor can idols, superstitions, or teachers of lies, of whatever description, profit any man, or render him profitable to others. Wo be to all who inculcate or countenance such human inventions or diabolical delusions! nay, to those, who are deluded to give that glory to a dumb idol, or to any creature, which our jealous God claimeth wholly deliver Israel from Egypt, and to meet them on mount Sinai. He had sent Moses from that quarter, and his visible glory seemed to come from thence. Then the firmament was illuminated by the displays of his Majesty; he was adored by all the angels of heaven, and the praise of his wonders rang through all the earth. The brightness of his glory was conspicuous and resplendent as the light: "he had horns coming out of his hand," an emblem of the power which he exerted, to defend Israel and scatter their enemies: or, as it may be rendered, "bright beams came forth from his side." The verb, whence the word here used is derived, signifies to shine, Ex. xxxiv. 28, 29. 35; and a pencil, or cone, of rays, issuing from a point, diverges in the shape of a horn." (Note, Ex. xxxiv. 29-35.) "In the place whence the light proceeded, he gloriously concealed his presence. Cappellus understands the verse of the lightning on mount Sinai: but I rather refer it to the brightness, which occasionally issued from the Shechinah. The Israelites were consumed by a fire, which went out from JEHOVAH. — The burnt-offering was consumed by a fire, which came out from before him." (Bp. Newcombe.) (Notes, Lev. ix. 24. x. 1, 2. Marg. Ref.) All this, however, was rather the hiding than the discovery of his almighty power: or, the hiding-place of his power, under which Israel was safely sheltered. Pestilences and fire marched before him and attended his steps, when he passed through Egypt, to destroy the first-born and desolate the land; when he appeared to the people from the top of Sinai; when he destroyed the rebels from among them, and when he marched before them to subdue the Amalekites; Amorites, Midianites, and other enemies. "This is a sudden burst of poetry, in the true spirit of the ode; the concealed connexion being, that God, who had formerly displayed such power in delivering the Israelites from Egyptian slavery, might succour their posterity in a like wonderful manner; and the enthusiasm of the poet leading him to neglect all obvious ways of entering on his subject." (Bp. Louth.) "The grandest circumstances are selected, the diction is as splendid as the subject." (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 6. The God of Israel stood and measured out Canaan, and allotted it for the inheritance of their tribes; as he had divided the whole earth among the nations. He dispersed the power of Egypt, which would have hindered Israel's departure to the promised inheritance; he destroyed the confederated nations of Canaan, that would have prevented them from taking possession of it. The whole creation seemed to be thrown into convulsions at the presence of Israel's God: Sinai and Horeb shook and quaked; and the most formidable and powerful opposers, (which were as the mountains and hills, that have kept their places from the creation,) were driven away as chaff, or made to bow down in subjection to his people. (Marg. Ref.) The mountains and hills are spoken of as emblems of eternity, because time seems to make no change in them. His ways, &c. His purposes are decreed from eternity, and will infallibly be executed in the appointed time." (Louth.)

V. 7. The prophet, in his vision, saw the consternation and distress of the Ethiopians, Arabians, Midianites, Moabites, Ammonites, and others who inhabited the adjacent regions; whilst they heard of the wonders wrought by JEHOVAH in delivering Israel; whilst they witnessed the convulsions of nature around them; whilst they learned how the Amalekites, and Silon and Og, had been destroyed by Israel; and when they found themselves attacked by the same terrible enemies. (Marg. Ref.) Several of these tribes dwelt in tents, or within curtains.

V. 8. The Lord was not displeased with the rivers or the sea, when he turned the waters of the Nile into blood, or when he divided those of the Red Sea and of Jordan; but he came, as in haste, to deliver Israel, attended by his holy angels, with his horses and chariots of salvation: and love to his people caused him thus to alter the course of nature, for their deliverance and prosperity. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9, 10. The question asked, in a very bold and poetical manner, in the eighth verse, is answered in the ninth; that God displayed his power to deliver his people, according to his faithful word." (Bp. Newcombe.) (Marg. Ref.) The Lord appeared as a mighty warrior, to fight for Israel, and made his bow, (here put for all the weapons of war,) quite naked, as openly prepared for the assault. This accorded to his oath and word of promise, to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in behalf of their descendants the tribes of Israel, to give them the land of Canaan. Therefore the Lord "did cleave," or divide, "the rivers of the earth," to open them a passage to their promised inheritance: and the mountains, as if conscious of JEHOVAH's presence with his people, trembled and quaked. The overflowing waters of the Red Sea, or of Jordan, removed, to make way for them; and being piled up as walls or mountains, they seemed to celebrate the praises of their Creator's power, and to lift up their hands in admiration and adoration of him. A most emphatic, sublime, and bold poetical figure! Some, however, understand the last clause in the ninth verse, of the rivers of waters miraculously flowing from the rock, when smitten by the rod of Moses, and following the camp of Israel during their wanderings in the wilderness.

V. 11. The sacred poet and prophet, in the midst of his rapturous praises, cannot be supposed to have attended to exactness of method. He therefore suddenly passed from the power of God displayed in dividing the sea and Jordan, to that shown when the sun and moon were stayed in their course, whilst Joshua was fighting with the Canaanites. They stood still in their tabernacle, the firmament of heaven. They stopped, and again moved, they shone, and then set, as best coincided with the Lord's plan when he fought for Israel: for his arrows and "the lightning of his spear," his manifested power, truth, and love to his people, shone so bright as to eclipse their feeble beams.

V. 12, 13. The Lord, at that time, and frequently in after ages, marched through the land of Canaan in indignation, to crush and scatter its heathen inhabitants, and to deliver his people from their oppressions. Thus he rescued them by the judges; and at length by David his anointed, all whose victories were typical of Christ's salvation. At those times he wounded the head, or the chief persons in the families of those wicked enemies of Israel: he subverted their power and prosperity, as a building that is razed to the foundation; or he wounded them mortally, as when the head is cloven down to the neck. Some, however, interpret these verses of preceding events. 'The ardour of the prophet having led him to begin in the midst of his subject, (3) he here returns to what passed in Egypt before the dividing of the Red Sea; the mention of which astonishing miracle he repeats, (15.) "Out of the house," * Or so that there should be no house; the prophet refers to the destruction of the first-born; —this is figuratively called the utter overthrow of the Egyptian houses.' (Bp. Newcombe.) Moses, Aaron, Joshua, &c. being especially appointed by God to their came † out as a whirlwind to scatter me; * their rejoicing was as to devour the poor secretly.

15 Thou didst walk through the sea with thine horses, through the heap of great waters.

16 When I heard, * my belly trembled; my lips quivered at the voice: rottenness entered into my bones, and I trembled in myself, that I might rest in the day of trouble: when he cometh up unto the people, he will invade them with his troops.

17 Although the fig-tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines: the labour of the olive shall fail, and distinct services, may be included among his anointed. (Marg. Ref.) As the Egyptians had craftily attempted to crush the enslaved Israelites, by destroying their male children; so God crushed Egypt, by destroying the first-born. And when Pharaoh had consented to Israel's departure, bearing afterwards that they were entangled in the country, he craftily attempted to come on them unawares, when unarmed or unable to resist or flee, that he might glut his revenge in their destruction: but he fell a victim, with all his forces, to his own malicious and insidious policy. (Marg. Ref.) The Egyptians rapidly followed the Israelites; and in imagination devoured a defenceless people. (Bp. Newcombe.) Nothing similar to this occurred after Israel had entered Canaan; though some expositors understand the passage of their triumphs over the Canaanites.

V. 14, 15. The Lord, by those instruments that he employed for the deliverance of his people, effectually smote through the heads of the cities and villages of Egypt. They came out furiously as a whirlwind to scatter Israel, rejoicing to afflict and oppress them, either by open violence, or by secret machinations: but Jehovan marched before his poor people through the Red Sea, as with his horses and chariots of war; and having guarded them through the heap of mighty waters, he overwhelmed and destroyed their pursuers, by the reflux of the sea into its former channel.

V. 16. This refers to what the prophet had heard of the Chaldean invasion, which had thrown him into the greatest agitation. His body trembled and was convulsed; his voice faltered; his bones were in pain and weakness, as if decayed through disease; and he trembled in the inmost recesses of his heart; anxiously inquiring, what refuge he could flee to, or what means he could use, to be safe and at rest in the approaching day of trouble, when the king of Babylon would come up, and invade, or cut in pieces, the people with his troops. 'I shall rest secure under the divine protection, when the Chaldeans shall come to invade Judea.' (Lowth.) Some expositors suppose, that the calamities and deliverances which the prophet foresaw were those of the Christian Church, as well as those of the Jews.

V. 17—19. The prophet foresaw, that the Chaldeans would utterly desolate the land, and render the vineyards, olive-yards, orchards, fields, and pastures, entirely unproductive; that every outward comfort would fail, and that the extremity of distress and hardship must be endured. And perhaps he also understood, that all the ordinances of God's house, and other means of grace and of divine consolation, would be suspended. Yet, by meditation, prayer, and praise, composing his mind, he was enabled to exercise faith and hope in God; he had those views of his power, truth, love to his people, and all-sufficiency for their happiness in life and death, and for ever, that he was determined to rejoice in him and his salvation, in all possible circumstances. The Lord God, his Strength, his Support, Protector, and Comforter, was able to make up all losses, to supply all wants, and to rejoice his heart under all afflictions. He would make his feet as those of the hind or hart, that he might walk safely on the brink of the most tremendous precipices, or climb on high places out of the reach of his pursuers; or that he might live in the enjoyment of his exalted privileges, and the hope of a most glorious inheritance; notwithstanding all difficulties, temptations, and dangers. This song of praise and believing prayer, he dedicated to the chief singer at the temple, to be set to music on some stringed instruments, which he had chosen or provided for that purpose. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

Whatever causes us to fear or grieve, should remind us to pray; whether it be a message from God's word, or a dispensation of his providence; whether it respect ourselves, or the Church, or those with whom we stand connected. If we fear, or grieve, that the work of God in our hearts, families, or congregations, declines, we should pray the more earnestly that the Lord would revive it in the midst of the years of our pilgrimage; that he would subdue our iniquities, increase our faith and love, convert sinners, and cause believers to be zealous, diligent, and fruitful. Even when we suffer the fatherly corrections of our God, we should hope and pray that in wrath he would remember mercy, and that we may be supported under our trials, and profited by them. We shall see no cause for despondency, either in our own case, or in that of the Church, when we remember the ancient wonders of his love to his people. The displays of his power, truth, and mercy, to Israel, and of righteous severity upon his enemies, were very resplendent, and his glory covered the heavens and the earth. How then have they been filled with the brightness of his light, displayed in the great redemption of his Son! The Majesty that shone from mount Sinai, at the Red Sea, in the wilderness, at the river Jordan, and in Canaan, (whilst the mountains saw and trembled, the deep adored, and the sun and moon stood still, as in amazement at their Creator's power, when he rode on his horses and chariots of salvation,) was great, and worthy to be praised: yet was it eclipsed by the harmonious discovery of the divine perfections which was made, when the Son of God suffered on the cross for the sins of his rebellious creatures. Then the sun was darkened, the rocks were cleft, the graves were opened, the veil of the temple was rent; and all creatures seemed to share in the astonishment and consternation, except the hardened priests, scribes, and pharisees! How glorious also was that display, when the earth quaked, and angels descended, to attend upon the resurrection of their crucified Lord! when the Holy Ghost came down from heaven on the assembled apostles, to testify his glorious ascension and exaltation at the right hand of the Father! and when he came in holy majesty and power to avenge himself on his crucifiers, to destroy Jerusalem, and to erect his kingdom on the ruins of that abrogated dispensation; and again to terminate the persecutions of his pagan enemies, by subverting the Roman empire! Great and glorious have been the works of our God for his Church; yet not only history, but prophecy, causes us to meditate terror, when we consider the intimations that are given of various severe conflicts, which his people must sustain with many antichrists.

In respect of the troubles which may befall us, however we may be impoverished, tempted, despised, persecuted, or afflicted, in life or death, we should seriously and frequently consider, how we may rest in the day of trouble. And if our fears lead us to abound in prayer and meditation, and in praising God for his former mercies to us or to his Church; if we are led to live wholly by faith in him, as the God of our salvation, and to "exercise ourselves to have a conscience void of offence, towards him and all men;" we shall find hope prevail. And as we shall have cause for rejoicing in every tribulation or peril, we shall be generally enabled to rejoice: we shall find our hearts assured of support and comfort by the way, and of finishing our course happily; and then other things will less move us: and whatever fail us, or be taken from or laid upon us, we may and ought to rejoice in our all-sufficient and eternal Portion. As he is the Strength, as well as Salvation, of his people, he will fit us for our warfare and our trials; he will carry us above, out of the reach of our enemies, and he will bring us to tread on our high places in his holy habitation in heaven, and to join the songs of those chief singers, who are now celebrating the praises of God and the Lamb. In hopes of this immortal crown, let us sit loose to earthly possessions and comforts, and let us cheerfully bear up under our crosses: for yet "a little while, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry;" and he will "take us to himself, that where he is, there we may be also."

BOOK OF ZEPHANIAH.

It is probable that Zephaniah delivered these prophecies towards the close of Josiah's reign, when religion was greatly declined in Judah, through the hypocrisy of those who had concurred in the reformation of that pious king. He was contemporary with Jeremiah, in the first years of that prophet; and often uses the same language. He severely reprov'd the wickedness of the Jews, and predicted the Chaldean invasion and its fatal effects: he exhorted the people to repent and seek the Lord, as the only method of escaping ruin, personal and public; he foretold various judgments, that were coming on those nations, which inflicted, or rejoiced over the miseries of the Jews; and he concluded with most animating predictions of evangelical times, and of great prosperity to the Church. These predictions entirely accord with many which have been considered: and it is certain that this prophecy formed a part of the sacred Scriptures, in the days of Christ and his apostles, though no express quotation is made from it in the New Testament.

CHAP. I. V. 1. Hizkiah. The letters of this name are the same with those of Hezekiah; and some have thought that this prophet was descended from that pious king. But it does not appear that he had any son except Manasseh; and there was not ^c a sufficient distance of ^d time between Hezekiah and Zephaniah, for four descents. (Lowth.)

V. 3. These are figurative representations of desolating judgments. Neither the fowls of the air nor the fishes of the sea would profit the Jews; and this would be equivalent to their being destroyed. Their idols were stumbling-blocks, the occasion to the people of falling into sin and misery: but in mercy they would be destroyed, with 4 I will also ^g stretch out mine hand upon Judah, and upon all the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and I will cut off ^h the remnant of Baal from this place, and the name of the Chemarims with the priests:

their obstinate worshippers; and accordingly that nation no more relapsed into gross idolatry after the captivity.

V. 4. A remnant of Baal's worshippers remained in Jerusalem, notwithstanding all Josiah's efforts to destroy that idolatry; but the Lord by the Chaldeans finally extirpated it. The Chemarims, or the black ones, were, an order of idolatrous priests or devotees to Baal, who perhaps wore black garments, or painted their faces black. (Marg. Ref.) 'The Chemarim were an order of superstitious priests, appointed to minister in the service of Baal, and were as his peculiar chaplains.' 'I will destroy these, together with the priests of the tribe of Levi, who have joined in the worship of idols.' (Lowth.)

V. 5. 'They join the worship of idols to that of the true God, who is a jealous God, and will not admit of any rival. Malcham is the same with Moloch, to whom the people continued to offer their children, notwithstanding the reformation that Josiah had made. Swearing is an act of religious worship, or a solemn invocation of God, as a Witness or Judge, and therefore expressly forbid to be used to idols.' (Louth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. Some had concurred in Josiah's reformation, who afterwards relapsed into idolatry; and they would be punished with those that had never professed to seek and serve him. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7, 8. The people were ordered to keep silence, and not murmur or object to the execution that was to take place in the approaching day of the Lord; for the slaughter of the wicked would be a sacrifice to his justice, which he had invited the Canaiteans and their confederates to feast upon. This alludes to the custom of those that offered sacrifice, which was to invite their friends to partake of the feast which accompanied it. (Louth.) In that day the princes and even the king's children would be punished. For though Josiah set his sons a good example, and doubtless gave them good instructions; yet they were very wicked, and shared abundantly in the public calamities. Jehoahaz died a captive in Egypt; Jehoiakim by a violent death; and Zedekiah having seen his sons slaughtered, and his eyes put out, was carried to Babylon, and died there. Such of the Jews also would be punished, as were weary of the dress of their country, and clothed themselves with the strange apparel of idolaters, as desirous of being in all respects conformed to them. The text may likewise be explained of such men as wore women's apparel, and such women as wore that belonging to men; which was contrary to an express law, and was a rite observed in the worship of some idols. (Louth.) (Note, Deut. xxii. 5.) 'The courtiers did imitate the strange apparel of other nations, all those that ^z leap on the threshold, which fill their masters' houses with violence and deceit.

10 And it shall come to pass ^b in that day, saith the LORD, that there shall be ^c the noise of a cry from ^d the fish-gate, and an howling from ^e the second, and a great crashing ^f from the hills.

12 And it shall come to pass at that time, that I will search Jerusalem with candles, and punish ^k the men that are settled on their lees; that say in their heart, The LORD will not do good, neither will he do evil.

13 Therefore ^l their goods shall become a booty, and their houses desolate.

'to win their favour thereby, and to appear glorious in the eyes of all others.'

V. 9. The servants of the oppressive princes and nobles exulted, in forcing their way into the houses of the oppressed; leaping for joy, when they passed over the thresholds, that they might convey the plunder into their masters' houses, for which they doubtless were liberally rewarded. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. A cry, &c. That is, of the enemy rushing into the city at different gates and in different quarters, on the people, from the hills; and a howling of the people, as terrified or slaughtered by them.

V. 11. Maktesh. 'The lower city. This is agreeable to the etymology of the word, which signifies a hollow place, or a mortar.' (Bp. Newcombe.) (Prov. xxvii. 22. Heb.) 'This is meant of the street of the merchants, which was lower than the rest of the place about it.'

Bearers of silver. 'The rich merchants in general, or the money-changers in particular.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 12. The Lord determined to detect, expose, and punish those secret idolatries, iniquities, and impieties, which had escaped all human observation. He would search every retired corner; as men search with candles for stolen goods: and no concealed abominations would then escape conviction or punishment. Or, 'No corner would escape the Chaldaeans, who should diligently search the houses, and plunder the wealth of them.' They especially would be punished, who were become daring through long continued impunity and prosperity; as wine grows stronger and more heady when it hath long settled on the lees; who had run into infidelity or atheism, and desisted alike the promises and threatenings of God, saying, in their hearts, that he would neither do good to his worshippers, nor punish his enemies. 'The thoughtless tranquility of the rich is compared to the fixed unbroken surface of fermented liquors.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The servants of God are all of one mind, and with one voice proclaim that "there is no peace for the wicked." How soon doth human depravity subvert all that man can do to revive true religion! Even where a decent exterior excites our favourable judgment, the Lord often sees such abominations as call for his severest vengeance. If the materials and occasions of sin shall perish with the wicked: how much more will the tempters, who seduce men to iniquity! When professors of true religion copy the crimes of the heathen, they must expect severer punishment than they. Vain are all endeavours to worship God and idols, to serve God and Mammon: and apostacy evinces hypocrisy, as neglect of God shows impiety and contempt: "for if any man draw back, the Lord will have no pleasure in him." May we "none of us be of those that draw back unto perdition, but of them that believe to the saving of the soul!" It will be unavailing in the day of the Lord, for sinners to object, cavil, or complain; nay, his presence will certainly stop their mouths: for it will appear that they who perish fall a sacrifice to his justice, for breaking his law, and because they have no interest by faith in the Redeemer's atoning blood. That day of God, (of which all temporal judgments are earnest,) will soon arrive; and then neither pious nor royal parents will prove any security to their ungodly children: nay, the children of kings and of saints, who have abused their peculiar privileges, will experience the deepest condemnation. Then various instances of vanity and conformity to the world will be adduced as proofs of men's pride and carnality, which now are deemed trivial or justifiable: and oppressors, and their agents, will be reckoned with for their ill-gotten treasures. Then there will be cries and howlings from every quarter, and among men of all descriptions. Then covetous and fraudulent merchants and traders will forget their gainful projects; and plausible hypocrites will be exposed in their secret iniquities. Then daring infidels, who have settled on their lees, and equally despised the favour and defied the wrath of God, will cry to the rocks to fall on them, and hide them from his intolerable frown. In short, in that time of wrath, of trouble and distress, neither men's silver nor their gold will be able to deliver them; but the whole will be consumed with the fire of the Lord's indignation. "What is a man profited, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? And what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" Let us then "flee from the wrath to come," and "choose that good part, that shall never be taken from us;" then we shall be prepared for every event; and nothing "shall separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

selves, that they may not be judged of the Lord. Nations under tokens of God's displeasure should gather together to deprecate his vengeance, before it be executed upon them: and whilst life is continued, sinners should be called upon to seek forgiveness, that the sentence recorded in Scripture may not be awarded against them; (Matt. xxv. 41;) otherwise the fierce wrath of the Lord will then drive them as chaff into everlasting punishment. Yet none but the meek of the earth, the contrite, who tremble at God's word, will sincerely seek this salvation. These are poor in spirit, and will hearken to the Lord's teaching, submit to his authority, plead guilty at his mercy-seat, do his will, and trust wholly to his mercy: these will " seek " first his kingdom and his righteousness;" they will long and pray for more humility and meekness; they will be harmless and blameless; and the chief hope of deliverance from national judgments is placed on their prayers and endeavours. But if they fail in this, they will be preserved or comforted under public calamities, and be safe " in the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous " judgment of God." But whilst the worshippers of God are punished for their hypocrisy, or corrected for their benefit, his open enemies have no cause to triumph. The whole word of the Lord is against them, and the sword of his justice shall certainly slay them. He hears their reproaches and revilings, when they calumniate his people, or rejoice over their faults, or speak evil of them for righteousness' sake; or when they magnify themselves against them in their afflictions: and he will assuredly abase the pride of his enemies, and avenge the injuries done to his servants. Carnal security, ambition, luxury, and sensual dissipated mirth, tend to dismay and desperation, whether in cities or individuals. Yet all the desolations of flourishing nations will make way for the subversion of Satan's kingdom of idolatry, impiety, and iniquity; that all men may worship the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. As we, in those remote isles of the heathen, experience the truth of these predictions, let us study to improve our advantages, expecting the performance of every promise, and praying that our Father's name may be hallowed all over the earth.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most alarming passages in the word of God encourage sinners to repent and seek his favour: and though none are more hopeless than degenerate professors of true religion; yet they should be exhorted to judge them-

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1-4. The prophet, having shown the judgments of God on the enemies of the Jews, returned to his subject, and proceeded to reprove and condemn that people for their transgressions. Jerusalem was become filthy and polluted; she was gluttonous, luxurious, and infamous, for all kinds of abominable wickedness, especially for oppression and violence. The inhabitants would not obey the voice of God, who spake to them by his word and his prophets; they hardened themselves in iniquity, or gave themselves up to rebellious murmurs and despondency when corrected; they trusted in their strength and allies, and not in the Lord, for protection and safety; and they drew not near to him, in his courts and ordinances, to seek his favour and assistance in their difficulties; but rather turned from him to their idols. Their princes, nobles, and judges were ravenous as lions; or as wolves that prowl abroad in the evening, after having been pinched with hunger all the day; and they seized all they could to lay it by for the future, as the greedy wolf makes havoc of the flock, reserving the bones to be gnawed when he had no longer an opportunity of devouring the prey. 'They devour all presently, and leave not so much as the bones to the next day; as the most voracious creatures commonly do.' (Louth.) Their prophets were superficial declaimers, men of light minds, without knowledge or seriousness: they deceived the people with false doctrines and predictions, and imposed upon them in their secular concerns; and the priests, like Hophni and Phinehas, polluted the temple by their crimes, and wrested the law by their corrupt glosses, that it might not seem to condemn them. This may be understood of the state of Jerusalem, from the death of Josiah to the Babylonish captivity: yet the context rather leads our attention to a subsequent period. The predictions of the former chapter relate to the return of the Jews from captivity, and to events connected with their prosperity after that deliverance; the latter part of this chapter evidently predicts the times of the Gospel; and the character here given of Jerusalem aptly suits the state of things among the Jews, from the birth of Christ to the calamities brought upon them by the Romans. Being filthy and polluted, they hearkened not to the voice of God, by John Baptist, by Christ, and by his apostles; instructions and corrections were unavailing for their reformation; they trusted in themselves, and not in their incarnate Lord, to whom they would not draw near. And the chief priests, elders, scribes, and pharisees, were precisely such blind guides, deceivers, oppressors, and perverters of the law, as are here described. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5-7. The special presence of the just Lord in Jerusalem, by his temple and ordinances, aggravated their guilt. He would do no iniquity, and their crimes would neither receive countenance from his example, nor toleration from his justice. By the continual instructions of his word and prophets, he failed not to make known his judgments to them: yet they continued shameless in their iniquities. This is very applicable to the personal presence of Christ with the Jews, and his daily teaching in the temple, the synagogues, and the streets: neither his holy example, nor his doctrine, could make them ashamed of their crimes. The Lord had also given the Jews warning, as well as wrought deliverance for them, by the desolations that he had made of other nations and their strong holds; not only those of distant countries, but also those of Ephraim and Samaria; expecting, (to speak after the manner of men,) that they would take the alarm, and fear him and receive instruction, that it might not be necessary utterly to destroy Jerusalem, however they were punished with gentle visitations. But instead of repenting, they grew more bent on wickedness, and corrupted all their doings. — Thus the Jews, in after ages, grew more and more corrupt amidst all warnings and deliverances; they rose early to crucify Christ and to persecute his followers; and in this manner they filled up the measure of their iniquities.

so unreclaimably sinful, make account of an heavy day, wherein I will arise to execute my vengeance on you.' (Bp. Hall.) 'Notwithstanding these provocations, I exhort the godly among you to expect the fulfilling of the promises I have made of restoring the Jewish nation to my wonted favour, in the latter ages of the world; in order to which crisis, I will execute remarkable judgments upon the unbelievers and disobedient. The same general summons may be meant which Joel speaks of.' (Joel iii. 2—12.) (Lowth.) " My determination is to gather the nations, that I may assemble the kingdoms, to pour upon them mine indignation, even all my fierce anger; when all the land shall have been devoured with the fire of my jealousy." When a jealous God had inflicted vengeance on his apostate worshippers, and desolated the promised land, he would proceed to pour out his indignation on all the nations and kingdoms, which rejected him and his salvation. This accords with the general scope of prophecy. (Marg. Ref.) The remnant, who waited for redemption in Israel, were exhorted, amidst the wickedness that they witnessed, and the oppressions they endured, to wait for the Lord. He was about to rise up as a lion to devour his prey; he had determined to gather the nations, that by them he might pour his fierce anger on the wicked Jews; until the whole land should be consumed by the fire of his jealousy against that adulterous generation: and then he would punish those who, influenced by corrupt motives, had been the executioners of his vengeance on his professed worshippers.— This may be interpreted, either of the Chaldeans and their allies, the Romans and their tributaries, or the antichristian nations that have so long supported the cause of idolatry, superstition, and persecution.

V. 9, 10. These verses predict the purifying and enlarging of the church, by the preaching of the Gospel, about the time when vengeance would be executed on the Jewish nation. Then " the Lord would turn to the " people," or peoples, (the original is plural,) " a pure " language;" which may signify either the pure and purifying doctrine of the Gospel; or the language which the grace of the Lord would then teach them to use. He would bring men acquainted with the language of humility, repentance, faith, spiritual knowledge, and wisdom, sincerity, purity, and love. He would teach them to speak of him and to him as they ought to speak; in order that they might all call upon, and serve, him with harmony and cordial unity of mind and mouth. For he would bring from the remote regions, beyond the rivers of Ethiopia, humble suppliants to his grace, who would be acknowledged as the children of his dispersed church, and who would offer to him spiritual sacrifices with acceptance. Doubtless this predicted the conversion of the Gentiles to Christ, as well as the happy effect of the Gospel on the believing Jews; and the conversion of the Ethiopian eunuch, with the effects of his preaching in his own country, may be considered as one instance of its literal accomplishment. (Marg. Ref.) 'Lest any should think that God's glory should have perished when Judah was destroyed, he sheweth that he will publish his grace throughout the world.' 'The Jews shall come as well as the Gentiles; which is to be understood under the time of the Gospel.' 'This is a blessing reserved for the latter ages, after the conversion of the Jews, and the coming in of the fulness of the Gentiles; when there shall be one Lord, and his name one.'

One consent. 'The metaphor is taken from beasts drawing together under one yoke; or men setting their shoulders together to carry the same burden.' (Lowth.)

V. 11—13. When this new dispensation should be introduced, and this new people formed of the converted Jews and Gentiles incorporated together, the Church would no more be ashamed for her sins. This does not mean, that believers would not be ashamed in a penitent manner; but that the reproach and punishment of all the former sins of the Jewish nation would rest on the unbelievers, and not on the Christian Church; and that all the sins of individuals would be repented of, atoned for, blotted out, and buried in oblivion. The Lord would at that time thoroughly separate from among them the pharisees and hypocrites, who gloried in their pride, in their relation to Abraham, external privileges, superstitious observance of their own traditions, or their self-righteous attention to the letter of the ritual or moral law. For the true Israel should no more be haughty on account of mount Zion, the temple, and the sacrifices there offered. These would utterly be destroyed and terminated by the Romans, and true Christians would, only glory in the cross of Christ. The Church would indeed be left in an afflicted and persecuted condition, and consist chiefly of poor persons; they would all be humble, meek, and lowly, or poor in spirit; and would know, that they had nothing to trust to, but the Lord, and his mercy, truth, and power. They would doctrines. Yet it has too often been the case, that Zion's professed healers have proved her worst disease; and her princes, priests, and prophets, the most abandoned to impiety and vice; and neither the presence of the just Lord in his ordinances; nor his example, his word, his messages by his more faithful servants, or even his providential corrections, could put them to shame. In this case, warnings and deliverances only tend to increase men's condemnation: for whilst the Lord desolates cities and nations for their sins, he requires his professing people to fear him and receive instruction, that they may escape ruin; and yet they often grow more corrupt under warnings and corrections, and are more assiduous in doing evil than the most diligent believer is in doing good.

V. 8--20.

The remnant of golly persons, that live in evil times, may confidently wait upon the Lord, both to save them, and to terminate the success of his enemies. He will certainly arise to pour upon the wicked the fierceness of his anger, and the whole earth will be devoured by the fire of his jealousy; yet then will he peculiarly bless those that wait for him. When he casts off professed Christians for their hypocrisy, he will send his Gospel to those who have hitherto sat in darkness: and his grace will render his people sincere in their professions, and holy in their conversation; teaching them a pure language, honourable to God, and edifying to men. Such persons should all call upon and serve the Lord with one consent; as "he seeketh those to worship him, who worship him in spirit and truth." For this purpose his Gospel is sent into regions, divided from each other by mountains, rivers, and seas; and all, who become humble suppliants to him for salvation, through faith in Jesus Christ, are numbered amongst the genuine children of his Church, and form a holy priesthood, to offer spiritual sacrifices unto him, wherever they are dispersed. They are also all made partakers of true repentance and complete forgiveness, and none of them shall be put to shame, because of their former transgressions. But the Lord will certainly cast out of his Church all that rejoice in their pride, and are haughty, because of those privileges which they abuse and idolize. He will exclude boasting, and leave no man any thing to glory in, save the Lord Jesus, "as made of God to him, wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption." All whom he saves are made poor in spirit, and most of them are poor and afflicted in the world: but whilst they trust in him, they cannot but be rich, noble, wise, and happy. Their humiliation in themselves, and their obligations to the Redeemer, concur in forming them upright and sincere; a people that do no iniquity, speak no lies, neither is a deceitful tongue found in their mouths: though nothing is more common amongst many who profess, disgrace, and are proud of, the doctrines of the Gospel; as their shops, customers, and those who depend on their word, too often can testify! But the sheep of Christ are harmless and inoffensive: they may securely rest upon his word, and repose their souls under his care; and he will feed them in his plenteous pastures, and preserve them from the power and terror of every enemy. Many indeed are the troubles of the righteous, from within and without; yet may they still rejoice in God, and triumph in his love. The king of Israel in the midst of them is the Lord of hosts; and he will soon take away their judgments, and save them so effectually, that they shall see evil no more for ever. Let us then encourage each other and ourselves against dejection, that our hands may not be slack, when we should work, or resist our enemies. The love of our mighty Redeemer is as large as his power: he rejoices to save the returning prodigal, to comfort the weeping penitent, to relieve the trembling suppliant, or to restore the wandering sheep: he delights in the objects of his choice, the purchase of his blood, the trophies of his victories, the work of his new creating grace. He rests well pleased in his love of his redeemed Church, and exults with joy over every poor sinner, whom he hath taught to trust in his mercy, to love his name, to obey his commands, and to copy his example. Surely then our hearts should rejoice in him, when we hear such words of infinite condescension and grace! We should express our joy by singing and speaking his praises; and we should rest in his love, and seek no other Refuge, Portion, or Felicity. We may now indeed be sorrowful, because detained from his solemn ordinances, whether by sickness, persecution, or providential hinderances: but we should be glad that this is our cross and grief; and we may rejoice at being reproached for loving the house and word of our God. In due time we shall be gathered into the temple above, from all our dispersions, notwithstanding our weakness and haltings in the Lord's ways: and then he will turn our mourning into joy and our reproach into honour, before the whole world. At length the last enemy shall be destroyed, and our captivity to Satan, sin, and death shall be finally abolished; and our glory and felicity will be perfect, unchangeable, and eternal.

BOOK OF HAGGAI.

The prophets, whose writings have hitherto engaged our attention, lived before, or during, the Babylonish captivity, and referred to it in most of their predictions; but the three that follow, prophesied after the return of the Jews to their own land. Haggai delivered all the messages here recorded, within four months. They relate to the building of the second temple, and contain reproofs, exhortations, and encouragements respecting that undertaking; and also predictions of Christ and his kingdom connected with them, nay, of the final and universal prevalence of the Gospel. The apostle Paul quotes Haggai, to prove that the prophets foretold our great revolution in the external state of the Church, which would shortly take place, and only one. (Comp. ii. 6, 7. with Heb. xii. 26, 27.)

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. (Notes, Ezra iv. 17—24. v. 1, 2. vi. 6—15.) The second year of Darius Hystaspis was about sixteen years after Cyrus issued his decree. The repeated testimony of Zechariah shews that these events occurred, not more than seventy years after the destruction of the temple by Nebuchadrezzar: (Zech. i. 12, 13. vii. 3—5.) and as no Darius reigned in Persia till long after that term, except Darius Hystaspis, it is beyond all doubt that he was intended. Shealtiel is exactly the same, in the original, with Salathiel, 1 Chr. iii. 17: and Josedech, with Jehozadak, 1 Chr. vi. 14, 15. It would have been more convenient to the mere English reader, if the same persons had uniformly been called by the same names, where the original is the same, or so nearly the same, as to preclude all doubt of the meaning. Jeshua, (Ezra ii. 2.) is spelt differently from Joshua in this verse: but the same person is evidently intended. 'If these two notable men had need to be stirred up and admonished of their 'duties; what shall we think of other governors, whose doings are either against God, or very cold in his cause.'

V. 2. The Jews, discouraged by opposition, had left off to build the temple; and they concluded that it was not a proper time to resume that work, though they did not intend to give it up. They were then few in number, and poor, compared with the affluence of Israel in the days of Solomon; their enemies were many, and the kings of Persia frowned on them; they had many temporal concerns, personal and public, to attend on; and they concluded that they should not be able to build the temple at all, or not with suitable magnificence. They therefore thought it best to rest contented with an altar on which to sacrifice, till a more favourable opportunity arrived. But the Lord of hosts, (whose power was sufficient to support them against all opposition,) took notice of these vain excuses, and therefore sent the prophet with the subsequent message. 'They preferred policy and private profit to religion.'

3 Then came the word of the LORD
 by Haggai the prophet, saying,
 4 Is it time for you, O ye, to dwell

 5 Now therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts; * Consider your ways.
 6 Ye have sown much, and bring in ye drink, but ye are not filled with drink;

 ye clothe you, but there is none warm;
 and he that earneth wages, earneth wages

 7 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, Consider your ways.
 8 Go up to the mountain, and bring

 9 Ye looked for much, and lo, it the LORD of hosts. Because of mine

V. 4. Though the Jews thought themselves unable to rebuild the temple; yet they were very active about their own houses, and many of them decorated them with wain-scot and ceilings of cedar, or other valuable materials; and then lived in them at ease and in indulgence. But if the times had been so bad, as to render it impracticable for them to build the temple, it would not have been in their power to acquire such houses for themselves. Their excuses were therefore fallacious, and even Zerubbabel and Joshua were faulty in conniving at their negligence. (Note, Ezra iv. 17—24.) The decree of Artaxerxes or Smer-dis the usurper, against the building of the temple, lost all its authority when he was slain; but that of Cyrus remained in full force: had the Jews therefore been duly zealous and courageous, they would immediately have resumed the work, which had been violently interrupted.—
 'It argues a great contempt of God and religion, when men think no cost or finery too much to bestow upon themselves; and the meanest accommodation good enough for the service of God.' (Louth.)
 V. 5—11. 'Consider the plagues of God upon you for preferring your policy to his religion; and because ye seek not him first of all.' The Lord next called the people to "consider their ways;" that is, not only their conduct and motives by way of self examination, but also the state of their affairs; by which they would perceive that their conduct was as impolitic as it was irreligious.
 They well knew that their crops of corn had been very scanty, in proportion to the land tilled, or the seed sown.
 They had not a sufficiency of meat or drink, either through scarcity, or for want of a blessing; their clothes soon wore out, and did not defend them from the cold; and the hard earned wages of the labourer or mechanic, seemed to be put into a bag with holes, they were so soon gone, through dearth of provisions and a variety of expenses. It was therefore expedient for them to review their conduct; and this would show them, that they should immediately, (though to the neglect of their own concerns,) go to mount Lebanon and prepare timber, and set about the building of the temple: and God would graciously take pleasure in it, as the centre of his worship, and the type of Christ, though far inferior in magnificence to Solomon's temple; yea, he would deem himself glorified by it. They must know, that when they had used all proper means, had every probability, and had entertained the most sanguine expectations of a large increase, they were strangely disappointed; and even what they had brought home was unaccountably wasted, as if the Lord had blown upon it, and driven it away! And wherefore was this? Truly, because they neglected the temple and left it in ruins, whilst they eagerly employed themselves in building and decorating their own houses: and therefore they were visited by drought and famine, and various diseases, both of man and beast. (Marg. Ref.) Brought it home, &c. (9) 'The line may very well be translated: "And ye have brought an offering to my house, and I have snuffed at it." (Bp. Newcombe.)

 (ii. 15.)
 V. 12. This message of the prophet had the proper effect. Though the rulers and people were faulty, yet they were not hardened as their fathers had been: and though they had not lately been accustomed to the ministry of prophets, and Haggai seems not to have wrought any miracle: yet they considered him as sent by the LORD their God, and revered his authority. Zerubbabel and Joshua were most ready to receive this reproof, and attend to his exhortation, and the people were influenced by their example. They therefore feared the Lord and obeyed his

CHAP. II.

The prophet encourages the Jews, by assuring them that this temple, though far inferior to the former in magnificence, would be rendered more glorious by the presence of the Messiah, 1—9. By the law concerning things holy and unclean, he shows that their sins had deprived them of God's blessings, which from that time he would vouchsafe them, 10—19. He predicts the prosperity of Christ's kingdom, under that of Zerubbabel his ancestor and type, 20—23

IN ^a the seventh month, in the one and twentieth day of the month, came the

V. 13—15. Within little more than three weeks after the first message was delivered, the people having already testified their readiness to obey, the prophet was sent again to them with a gracious assurance of the Lord's presence and favour. He was called the Lord's messenger, (the word being the same that is generally rendered an angel.) because of his employment, which was to bring messages from God to the people. His word was attended with a powerful blessing, in stirring up their minds and animating their courage for this arduous undertaking. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Even pious persons often need to be excited by repeated admonitions to the duties of their station; especially when attended by danger and difficulty. Many good works have been purposed, and not performed, because men imagined that the proper time was not come: thus believers lose opportunities of usefulness, and sinners procrastinate in the concerns of their souls till it be too late. The Lord notices all the objections and excuses, with which men satisfy themselves and each other in the neglect of duty; and when he shall expose and answer them, every mouth will be stopped. Providential dispensations are seldom interpreted properly without a careful attention to the word of God: thus many conclude that poverty or trouble excuses them from duty; when indeed it is intended to rebuke their negligence. They who plead that they cannot at present afford to contribute to pious or charitable designs, often lavish in needless expenses on their tables, houses, furniture, apparel, or decorations, ten times as much as was expected from them for far better purposes: and few are aware how large a fund frugality and self-denial may raise, even from persons of moderate incomes, for good works, without the least injury to them or their families. But if men will dwell in ceiled houses, and indulge every wayward inclination, when the house of God lies waste and his poor are starved, they may expect rebukes and corrections. How can they, who evidently do not seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, think themselves true Christians? And are not lukewarm professors marked in God's word with peculiar disapprobation? (Rev. iii. 15, 16.) Indeed they who do not prosper in the world ought to consider their ways: for "there is, that withholdeth more than is meet, and it tendeth to poverty." If the Lord be offended by a man's selfishness, he can easily blast all his projects, and insensibly reduce him, whatever his occupation or industry may be. He can deprive him of all comfort in his possessions; and even if his income be not scanty, he can cause it to spend badly, and then all his gains shall seem to be put into a bag with holes; all his labours be fruitless, all his possessions blown upon, and all his expectations frustrated. Our dependence is in every thing so entirely on God, that when we look for much, and have little, and are remarkably crossed in our undertakings, it behoves us to inquire, wherefore he contendeth with us? And if we attend to his word, consult his ministers, inquire of him in prayer, and examine ourselves; we shall not fail to find out the cause. Perhaps some duty is neglected, the payment of some vow is postponed, or some worldly object is idolized. When this discovery is made, we should without delay amend what was amiss: and if we attend to those things, which please the Lord and wherein he is glorified, whatever else be neglected or procrastinated, we shall best consult our own true interest and comfort; but without that faith and fear, which produce unreserved and prompt obedience, we cannot expect that the Lord will be with us. The most exalted or sacred characters ought not to be offended, when reminded of their duty by the meanest servant of God; they should reverence his authority, and submit to his reproof, in the words of his ministers: and the more wisdom and piety they have, the more readily will they attend to such exhortations. When leading men set the example, it will influence the remnant of the people, and they may expect encouragement; and if the Lord be with us, who can be against us, to prevent our success, or in any measure to hurt us? These considerations should stir up our spirits to be diligent and courageous in laying ourselves out in the work assigned us: yet if any means prove successful to render us zealous in good works, we must give all the praise to him, from whom alone "cometh every good and perfect gift," and "who worketh in us to will and to do of his good pleasure."

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 3-5. (Note, Ezra iii. 12, 13.)

This took place about sixty-eight years from the time, when the temple had been destroyed, and about seventeen years from the issuing of the decree of Cyrus: and some Jews remained yet alive, who had seen the former temple in their youth, before they were carried to Babylon. These could not but observe, from the preparations, the plan, and the foundations, that this new temple was likely to be much inferior to it in grandeur. Whilst they lamented this, they seem to have undervalued the labours of the people, and to have discouraged their work; and therefore the Lord sent his servant to prevent the effects. He allowed, that this house must appear as nothing in the eyes of those who had seen the other in its glory; yet, that should not prevent the rulers and people from proceeding with vigour and courage; as God was with them to prosper their work, according to the promises of the covenant made with their fathers; and his spirit, the Author of all true glory and excellency, remained with them, to direct, sanctify, and bless them, as in the days of old; and therefore they needed not fear acceptance or assistance. Some interpret the LORD of hosts, the Word that covenanted with them, and the Spirit, of the three Persons in the Trinity, who would remain with them as the peculiar people of the triune JEHOVAH.

V. 6-9. For their further encouragement, the people were informed, that during the continuance of this temple, a new dispensation would be introduced. "Yet once more," the Lord intended entirely to change the external form of his Church, and to bring in that dispensation that would endure to the end. The word, once, has a clear sense, if understood of the evangelical age; for many political revolutions succeeded; but only one great and final religious revolution. (Bp. Newcombe.) It should also be remembered, that the apostle has thus interpreted it. Heb. xii. 27, 28.) This would be in a little more, compare with the years that had passed since the first promise of the Messiah, or even from the giving of the law. Then the Lord would shake the heavens and the earth, &c.: various convulsions and changes would take place in the Jewish Church and state, which would end in the abrogation of the ritual law and the whole Mosaic dispensation, the disannulling of the national covenant, the subversion of their constitution, the destruction of Jerusalem, and the ruin of their civil government: and attended with earthquakes, tempests, and violent commotions of the elements, above and beneath, by sea and by land. (Marg. Ref.) These events would be preceded by great revolutions and commotions among the nations; the Persian monarchy would be subverted by the Macedonians, and that by the Romans; and all these changes would make way for the coming of Christ, and the introduction of his spiritual kingdom. At the appointed time, He, "the Desire of all nations," whom all nations ought to desire, and in due time would desire; He, in whom all the nations of the earth were to be blessed, and of whose coming a general expectation would prevail, as of some most desirable event; He would come, and his presence, who is the glory of the Lord and the true Temple, "in whom all the fulness of the Godhead dwells bodily," would fill that house with glory, and render it far more glorious, than the Shechinah (or visible glory) rendered Solomon's temple. The Lord could, if he so pleased, enrich that house with silver and gold beyond the former temple; for all the treasures of the earth are his: but as a more spiritual dispensation was about to be introduced, he had a greater and a more spiritual glory to confer upon it, in the presence of Immanuel, his incarnate Son. Thither he would come, as the Prince of peace; there he would preach and confer peace; and in the mean time God would give peace to those who worshipped there, in anticipation of the blessings of Messiah's reign. The second temple could not excel the first in glory, in any other respect than this: it was indeed considerably beautified, decorated, and enriched in after ages, but nothing equal to the splendour of the temple in the days of Solomon; and the Jews allow, that the ark of the covenant, the visible glory, and some other things which distinguished the former temple, were wanting in this. But they cannot find any thing that is worthy to be mentioned, in which it was more glorious; though they have been excited to rack their invention to the utmost for that purpose. For as the second temple hath been destroyed above seven hundred years; if nothing else can be added, in which its glory exceeded that of Solomon's temple, it must be allowed that the presence of the promised Messiah was intended; and if this be yielded, it will undeniably follow that Jesus of Nazareth was he: and thus they must condemn their own obstinate rejection of him, concerning whom all their own prophets spoke. For in this alone did the glory of the latter house exceed that of the former, that the Desire of all nations, the Lord of glory, came to it personally, and in human nature. So that this prophecy alone is sufficient to decide the controversy with them, seeing they allow the divine inspiration of Haggai. Some indeed speak, as if Herod the Great entirely pulled down this temple and builded another: but the account of Josephus on that subject is not consistent with itself and with other writers, and seems rather penned in the style of panegyric than of history; and, however Herod repaired, beautified, and enlarged the out-buildings of the temple, it never was the general opinion of the Jews themselves, that he demolished the second temple; but that it continued the same, till its destruction by the Romans. With that event the old dispensation ended; for the Desire of all nations was come, and he erected his spiritual temple, as it were, upon the ruins of it. The word rendered come, (7) is plural, and it is with probability supposed, that the substantive should be plural also. "The desires of all the nations shall come." Some learned men, therefore, have argued, that the precious or desirable things, namely, the riches of the nations, are meant; and that it is a forced construction to interpret the passage of the Messiah. The objections to this interpretation are, the great solemnity of the introduction, (6, 7) and the impropriety of the language, "The desirable things of all nations shall come," "when it should rather be said, "the desirable things of all nations shall be brought." The word is used plurally, with the force of the singular, (like delicia, or spes, in Latin.) Dan. ix. 23, vir desideriorum, "greatly beloved," Cant. v. 16, we have—and ipse totus desideria for desiderabilis." (There is a plural Hebrew noun of the same root as that here made use of, applied by the Spouse to her Beloved: or by the Church to Christ. It is rendered, "altogether lovely," but is more liberally, altogether lovelinesses. It may well be doubted, whether the second temple could exceed that of Solomon, in the splendour and costliness of its ornaments. Præaux values the gold, with which the holy of holies alone was overlaid, at four millions three hundred and twenty thousand pounds sterling. It seems to me that, supposing the Messiah to be prophesied of, greater precision in the language would not have been used: for this would have led the Jews to expect a demolition of the temple then building, and the erection of another in its stead. No nominal distinction, between Zerubbabel's and Herod's temple, seems to have been ever made by the Jews: but in popular language, these structures, though really different, were spoken of as the same. On one occasion, Josephus himself mentions only two buildings of the temple; a former, in the time of Solomon; and a later, in that of Cyrus. In Chronicon Hebraicum, &c. Vespasian is said to have destroyed the temple four hundred and forty years after it was rebuilt." (Bp. Newcombe.) No more than seven years were spent in building Solomon's temple, and only four in building the second temple, from the time when the Jews resumed the work: it is therefore most evident, that Herod never pulled down the temple, in order to erect a new one. There was a temple for the worship of JEROVAH according to the law, during all the forty-six years which were spent in repairing or rebuilding it.—One pari must therefore have been taken down at once, as far as needful for the purpose, and no more: but the old foundation and many parts of the structure no doubt remained. Whoever compares the sixth chapter of the first of Kings, even with the most splendid accounts of the second temple, however adorned with costly stones, &c. must perceive, that the former being overlaid in every part with pure gold, gave it a glory, of this kind, which was incomparably beyond that of the second temple, in its highest magnificence: and the prophecy clearly means, that the glory of the second temple should exceed the glory which the first had at any time been favoured with. Nothing but the presence of the incarnate Son of God could fulfil this prediction.

V. 10—14. The time that had elapsed from Haggai's first message to this, being nearly four months, seems to have been taken up in preparing to build: but now the people proceeded to the work itself. The prophet was on this occasion ordered to propose two questions to the priests, (the oratory interpreters of the law. Supposing a man should carry in the skirt of his garment any part of the holy oblations, (which were to be eaten by the priests alone, in the courts of the temple,) and then with that same skirt touch some ordinary provision, would that communicate sanctity to the bread, flesh, wine, or oil thus touched? This the priests answered in the negative; ceremonial holiness could not be thus conveyed. On the other hand, if a man who was unclean by a dead body, touched such provisions, would that not render them unclean, unfit to be offered to God, or even for common use? To which they answered in the affirmative. It was then evident, that uncleanness was more easily communicated than holiness: and the inference was, that the people, when they lived in the neglect of their duty as to the building of the temple, through a covetous or self-indulgent attention to secular concerns, could not have their ordinary employments sanctified by the sacrifices which they offered; but on the contrary, they polluted their religious duties by their own unbelief and hypocrisy. 'That thing, which is of itself good, cannot make another so; and therefore they ought not to justify themselves by their sacrifices and ceremonies: but he that is unclean and not pure of heart, doth corrupt those things, and make them detestable to God, which else are good and godly.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15-19. The people were therefore called on, to consider from that time, both what had befallen them and what was about to befall them: and to compare these together. Before they had begun to place more courses of stone, on the foundation which they had laid some years before, that is, during the years that the work had been neglected, they had been strangely frustrated in their expectations. If a man came to a heap of corn in the straw or in the chaff, which he computed at twenty measures, he seldom obtained more than ten: for there proved to be much straw and chaff, and little corn. Or if a man expected fifty barrels of wine from the grapes which he carried to the wine-press, when he came to draw it off after they had been pressed, there proved no more than twenty: for every so unproductive. For the Lord had been so often d with their carnal negligence of his temple, that he disappointed them in all their works; and visited them with various calamities, which they ascribed to second causes, and so did not repent or return to his service. (Marg. Ref.) But let them take notice that from that very day, when they began to build on the foundation of his house; though their corn was not gathered in, nor had their trees begun to bud, (for it was nearly the depth of winter,) and there was no appearance of a favourable change: yet from that day he would as remarkably bless them with fruitful seasons and an abundant increase; both graciously to recompense their obedience, and to encourage them to proceed.

V. 20-23. "And the word of the LORD came the second time unto Haggai, in," &c. The conclusion of the book was a second message sent by the prophet, on the same day with that which precedes. Zerubbabel, as the governor of Judah, was the type as well as the progenitor, of Christ; to whom doubtless the prophecy was principally directed. The Lord again declared his purpose of causing violent convulsions and revolutions in the heavens and earth, or in the state of the Church and of the world. He would subvert monarchies one after another, and destroy nations by intestine wars. But he would take Zerubbabel, and keep him safe as his signet; and employ him to rule over his people, as a man ratifies deeds by his signet or seal, and sets it on any thing as a security, or to mark authenticity or appropriation: for he had chosen him for that purpose. This was a gracious intimation, that the Lord would preserve Zerubbabel, and the people of Judah by him, amidst the machinations of their enemies and the ruin of surrounding states and kingdoms; but it also predicted the establishment and continuance of the kingdom of Christ, the elect Servant of the Father, the Governor of Judah; by union with whom his people are sealed with the Holy Ghost, and stamped with his image, and thus distinguished from all other persons, and preserved unto the day of redemption. And it predicted the changes, that would take place in the Church, and in the kingdoms of the world even to that time, when the kingdom of Christ shall subvert, and occupy the place of all those monarchies that have opposed his cause. This could not be fulfilled in Zerubbabel, who did not in all likelihood live many years after the finishing of the temple; and to be sure did not see any of these great changes here foretold: and therefore the Messiah must be here described under the name of Zerubbabel, as he elsewhere is under that of David. (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The word of God is intended to encourage us, as well as to excite us to our work. They who have witnessed, or read of extraordinary effects produced by the power of God in his ordinances, should not despise or dishearten those who are endeavouring to do good in a little way with small success, and under great disadvantages. Though it may appear as nothing in their eyes, yet the seed may spring up and become a great tree; and every degree of good to souls should be thought important. Indeed men are very incompetent judges of what is glorious in religious matters: many things excite admiration because they are noisy and ostentatious; whereas "the kingdom of God cometh not with outward observation." Abiding and blessed effects are sometimes produced by obscure and despised instruments, and for a time in silence and neglect: till at length they burst forth to public view, and claim attention as excellent, useful, and permanent; when such, as for a little time excited admiration and applause, but were more superficial, vanish or terminate in confusion. If we be therefore occupied according to the command of God, and in dependence on his promise, we should be strong in faith, vigorous and active, labouring in hope, even in obscurity and with little visible success; for though man may despise us, the Lord of Hosts will be with us, according to his covenanted word, ("Lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the world:?) and his Spirit, who abideth with his people for ever, will not refuse us a measure of success and comfort in our work: therefore we should not fear. That power, which shakes the heavens and the earth, the sea and the dry land; and which effected such changes and revolutions among the Jews and Gentiles, in the first ages of the Gospel, can easily prepare men's hearts in any congregation, or of any description, to welcome Christ as the Desire of their hearts and precious to their souls. He whose are all the riches of the earth and all their possessors, can defray the expense of any undertaking which is really for his glory; so that we may depend on him for whatever we want: and if his ministers be poor, or the places appropriated to his worship mean, or any apparently good design fail of adequate resources, we may be sure that he sees it best for his servants, and most for his own glory, that it should be so. They, however, who are stewards of his gold and silver, should remember, that he will demand an account of the use which they make of them; and when they contribute most liberally to pious or charitable designs, they should observe, that they only render to the Lord a portion of his own, and that he hath a right to demand the whole whenever he pleases. But the glory of the Gospel-Church is greater than that of either the former or the latter temple: for "Behold a greater than Solomon is here!" The Desire of all nations is the precious Foundation and approved Corner-stone of this spiritual temple: believers are the living stones of which it is formed; and it is the constant habitation of God by his Holy Spirit, and shall be for evermore. Here are contained the whole spiritual beauty and glory of the earth: hereafter, being removed to heaven, these will be the joy and admiration of angels and arch-angels to all eternity. May then revolutions and reformations in churches and kingdoms, make way for Christ to be desired and valued by all nations; may he abundantly fill his habitation with the glory of his holiness, peace, and consolation; and may the poor blinded Jews have their eyes opened to behold the preciousness of him, whom they have hitherto rejected, and who indeed was "a Light to lighten the Gentiles, and the Glory of his people Israel!"

V. 10—23.

Holiness becometh the temple of God and his spiritual priesthood; and they who are appointed to interpret his word, ought to be ready and expert in solving cases respecting it. The merest novice, however, in spiritual things, must know that "evil communications corrupt good manners;" and yet the company of saints hath no natural efficacy to sanctify: for diseases are often infectious, but health cannot be imparted in the same way. Pollution, being congenial to our nature, is more easily communicated than holiness: how dangerous then is it for those who profess godliness to form intimate connexions with unbelievers, vainly hoping to impart good, when they have immensely more cause to fear the most important injury to themselves! We should also learn not to depend on external services, which are all rendered unclean by an unbelieving, carnal, and hypocritical heart. Whilst we live in known sin or neglect of known duty, we cannot reasonably expect benefit from ordinances, or comfortable success in our temporal concerns; but when we are uprightly obedient, the Lord graciously accepts our imperfect and defiled services. Were we carefully to consider the different parts of our lives, and compare them with each other, we should many of us perceive an evident difference between those in which we have been totally irreligious or greatly negligent, and those in which we have endeavoured "first to seek the kingdom of God and his righteousness;" and that the former have been far more full of anxiety and disappointment, the latter of success and comfort, even in outward things. But if it have not been remarkably so with us; yet the Lord will curse the blessings of the wicked, and embitter the prosperity of the negligent; and he will sweeten the cup of affliction to those who humbly and diligently serve him. And whatever changes take place on earth, all will concur in promoting the comfort, honour, and happiness of his servants, who devote themselves unreservedly to him: even as they will tend to establish the kingdom of Christ, the chosen Signet of the Father, by whom all believers are preserved and sealed unto life eternal.

BOOK OF ZECHARIAH.

Zechariah began to prophesy two months after Haggai; being raised up to be his counjutor in exciting the Jews to rebuild the temple: but it is probable, that he continued to exercise his prophetic office during a much longer time; though the visions and predictions, in the latter part of the book, are not dated. Various traditions are extant concerning him: but in general they are improbable, or uncertain and frivolous; so that no more is known of him, than what is recorded in Scripture, and may be seen by consulting the marginal references on the verses in which his name is mentioned. His prophetic character and usefulness are recorded by Ezra: (Ezra v. 1, 2. vi. 14) and his book is repeatedly quoted and referred to, and thus sanctioned as the word of God, in the New Testament. (Com. ix. 9. with Matt. xxi. 4, 5. John xii. 14—16.—xi. 12, 13. with Matt. xxvii. 7—10.—xii. 10. with John xix. 34—37. Rev. i. 7.—xiii. 7. with Matt. xxvi. 31. Mark xiv. 27) The numerous and extraordinary prophecies, however, which it contains, sufficiently demonstrate that the prophet spoke as he was moved by the Holy Ghost." Many of these have been undeniably and most wonderfully accomplished: and the rest, though considered as peculiarly obscure, on careful investigation will be found to foretel, sometimes under other emblems and metaphors, the same future events with the most remarkable predictions, both in the Old and New Testament.

Zechariah has been styled, 'the sun among the minor prophets;' and the time approaches, when the propriety of this title will no doubt be fully illustrated. After general warnings and exhortations to repentance, the prophet foretels the completion of the temple; the rebuilding, replenishing, security, and prosperity of Jerusalem and the cities of Judah, and the judgments of God on the enemies of his people: but, in doing this, under the types of Zerubbabel and Joshua, and by using figurative language, he predicts the coming of Christ our King and High Priest, the establishment of his kingdom, the building of his spiritual temple, the conversion of the Gentiles, and the enlargement and prosperity of the Christian Church, (i.—iv. vi.) By the visions of a flying roll and an ephah, he shows the judgments which would come on the wicked Jews, and the abject and oppressed state of the nation, after they had filled up the measure of their sins. (v.) Then follow prophecies (interspersed with warnings and exhortations) of prosperity and enlargement to Jerusalem; till at length, the strong nations of all languages would become the worshippers of JEHOVAH, and join themselves to his people. (vii. viii.) The intermediate events to the surrounding nations, and to the Jews from the completion of the temple till the coming of Christ, are next foretold, with figurative intimations of the prevalence of his Gospel, by the triumphs of his apostles and servants. (ix. x.) To these are subjoined, the destruction of the temple, and the rejection of the nation for contempt of Christ, and other sins; and afterwards of the nations that oppressed Jerusalem and the Church. At length a bright scene is opened to our view, by prophecies of the conversion of the nation to their crucified Messiah; the humility, zeal, and excellence of the new converts; and the final ruin of all idolatry and false religion. (xi. xii. xiii. 1—5.) And finally, the inspired writer returns to speak more explicitly of the death of Christ, as our sacrifice, by the sword of divine justice; the tremendous judgments which would then be inflicted on the unbelieving Jews; the preservation of a remnant, through fiery trials, and their conversion; the taking and destruction of Jerusalem to be followed by the ruin of the nations who had fought against her; the removing of hinderances, that the Gentiles might enter the Church; its establishment in the primitive times; the state of things during the succeeding ages, to the restoration of the Jews, and the rebuilding of their city, and the arrival of the Millennium, when all the nations will be either terribly destroyed, or become joyful worshippers of God; and the course of holiness shall decidedly and finally prevail. (xiii. 7—9. xiv.) This is the general outline of the book, according to the author's view and interpretation of it, which is here given, to assist the reader in forming his judgment on the exposition of particular prophecies, in several of which the author has felt some uneasiness, in being compelled to differ from many learned and correct commentators, who have gone before him.

IN the eighth month, in the second year of Darius, came the word of the LORD unto Zechariah, the son of Barachiah, the son of Iddo, the prophet, saying,

2 The LORD hath been sore displeased with your fathers.

3 Therefore say thou unto them, Thus saith the LORD of hosts; Turn ye unto me, saith the LORD of hosts, and I will turn unto you, saith the LORD of hosts.

4 Be ye not as your fathers, unto whom the former prophets have cried, saying, Thus saith the LORD of hosts;

1 Turn ye now from your evil ways, and from your evil doings: but they did not hear, nor hearken unto me, saith the LORD.

6 But my words and my statutes, which I commanded my servants the prophets, did they not take hold of your fathers? and they returned and said, Like as the LORD of hosts thought to do unto us, according to our ways, and according to our doings, so hath he dealt with us.

7 Upon the four and twentieth day of the eleventh month, which is the month Sebat, in the second year of Darius, came the word of the LORD unto Zechariah, the son of Barachiah, the son of Iddo, the prophet, saying, murder of one, who suffered before the persecuting reigns of Ahaz, Manasseh, and Jehoiakim, (during which more innocent blood was shed, and more prophets were slaughtered, than in all preceding ages,) should be mentioned as the last of the righteous persons, whose blood would be required of the generation which crucified the Messiah?—The blood shed, after the death of Zechariah, son of Jehoiada, especially filled up the measure of national wickedness, and brought on Judah the Babylonish captivity: yet, on this supposition, it is wholly passed over by our Lord. But if Zechariah the prophet were meant, and if he were murdered after the captivity, as the other Zechariah had been before; the whole appears natural, and probably he might be the last eminent person who thus suffered.

V. 2—4. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5, 6. "Your fathers are dead." "It is true, you say, and so are the prophets too. It was not for them to live here for ever. But though my prophets died; yet the words, both of counsels and menaces, which they delivered to your fathers, live still. Your fathers freely confessed, to God's glory and to their own shame, Right, so as God threatened to deal with us according to our doings, even so hath he done; we are sinful and miserable, and he is just." (Bp. Hall.) "As men astonished with my judgments,—not touched with true repentance." It must be supposed, that some were merely astonished, and others truly penitent.

Overlake. "As an enemy does one that he pursues." (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 7. Sebat is the Chaldee, or Syriac, name of the eleventh month, which contained part of our January and part of February.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. Barachiah. (Note, Matt. xxiii. 34—36.) It is the general opinion of expositors, that our Lord, in the passage referred to, means Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada. (Note, 2 Chr. xxiv. 19—24.) Yet some reasons may be alleged, which at least render it probable that the prophet Zechariah was intended. For why should the son of Jehoiada be called the son of Barachiah?—Chrysostom indeed asserts that Jehoiada was also called Barachiah, which signifies, one that blesses the Lord, as Jehoiada does one that confesses him: but there is not the smallest proof in Scripture that he was ever so called: and if the son of Jehoiada be meant, an alteration of the text in Matthew must be admitted, which is not advisable, unless absolutely unavoidable. Zechariah is a young man when he began to prophesy (ii. 4:) he might live long after the temple was finished, and after the death of Zerubbabel and Joshua. Zechariah, of Iddo, is mentioned among the priests, in the days of Joiakim, the son of Joshua, (Neh. xii. 16;) and tradition reports, that Zechariah was of the sacerdotal line. It is not peculiarly improbable, that the Jews, exasperated by his faithful expostulations, should murder him in the inner court of the temple: and the canon of Scriptures, being previously closed, could not record it, any more than the martyrdom of those who suffered under Antiochus Epiphanes. The silence of Josephus proves nothing, as usually, when he can pass over, or palliate, whatever he thinks dishonourable to his people. The transaction might, however, be well known in our Lord's time, by tradition, or authentic history. But, especially, let it be considered, how far it might have been previously expected, that the

V. 14—17. Upon this the Angel, who condescended to commune with the prophet, commissioned him to proclaim these good tidings to his people; and to assure them that the Lord of all the armies in heaven and earth was jealous with vehement jealousy, or zeal, for, as he had been against, Jerusalem. His love and endeared relation to his Church would not permit him to overlook the injuries done her. He was greatly displeased with the Chaldeans and others, who had reduced the Jews to deep and permanent distress: for he had been displeased a little with them, and they had helped forward the affliction. The Jews had indeed deserved the heaviest indignation of God; nor could their enemies proceed further than he intended: but they acted out of ambition, malice, and enmity against them; they took pleasure in their disgrace and misery; they used their power with cruelty and tyranny; and they intended to have continued them perpetually in a state of abject bondage and captivity. Therefore the Lord was highly displeased with them. 'God was displeased with the instruments of his vengeance, for their extreme cruelty to the Jews; and with the nations, who insulted over them in their distress.' (Bp. Newcombe.) (Marg. Ref.) At the same time, the Jews must be assured, that the Lord was actually reconciled to them, and was returned to dwell among them, with abundance of mercy: the temple would certainly be rebuilt; and the line stretched forth over every part of the city, to mark out the streets of it for building, that it might be restored to its ancient dimensions and prosperity. Nay, the prophet was further to proclaim, that, through the prosperity intended them, the other parts of the land would be replenished with cities: for the Lord would comfort the inhabitants of Zion, and make effectual his choice of Jerusalem, as the centre of his worship and the place of his peculiar and gracious residence.—These predictions primarily related to the state of the Jews after the captivity: yet that was but a shadow of what shall take place in the Church, after the termination of the oppression of the New Testament Babylon.

V. 18—21. The prophet had immediately after a vision of four horns, which represented those powers that had scattered the Jews and desolated the city and land. And then ЯЕВОНАВ, the person with whom he communed, showed him four carpenters, or smiths, (workmen), who came to fray or demolish these horns of the Gentiles.—Some by the horns understand the four great monarchies, which had scattered or would scatter the Church: and then the carpenters or workmen may mean in part the same powers: the Persians cast out the Chaldeans, the Macedonians the Persians, and the Romans the Macedonians; and the Goths and other northern nations cast down the power of the Romans. Others understand, by the four horns, the several kings of Assyria, Chaldea, and Persia, that had successively crushed Israel and Judah: and then they suppose Zerubbabel, Joshua, Ezra, and Nehemiah, to be the four carpenters. But perhaps the vision only meant in general, that enemies from the four winds had arisen, or would arise, against the Jews and the Church; but that able instruments would be raised up to defeat their attempts, to deliver the people of God, and so make his cause to prevail and prosper. And this may take in both the ministers of his word and those of his Providence. Some interpret the four horns to mean the Samaritans, Ammonites, Arabians, and Philistines, who harassed the Jews that had returned from Babylon; but these nations have never scattered Israel and Judah. 'Why four? To denote that these kingdoms had many enemies; enemies on every side.' (Bp. Newcombe.) 'These signified all the enemies of the Church, east, west, north, and south.' (ii. 6.) The carpenters, or smiths, are God's instruments, which with their mallets and hammers break these hard and strong horns; and declare that no enemies' horn is so strong, but God hath an hammer to break it to pieces.' Smiths. 'These were to repair the destructions which the horns had made.' (Louth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

It tends greatly to the conviction of the hearers, when several of the Lord's ministers testify the same truths: and they, who profit by the means afforded them, shall have them continued and increased. Humiliation for sin must precede the comfort of forgiveness: and therefore "the ministration of condemnation" should make way for "the ministration of righteousness and of the Spirit."—All our sufferings arise from the just displeasure of the Lord: and this must continue from generation to generation against our sinful race, except as any turn to him by repentance and faith. His readiness to forgive, and to return in mercy to the humble suppliant, should encourage and induce us to repent; and we should earnestly beg of him to "turn us, that we may be turned." We must follow no examples further than they accord to the word of God: and therefore they whose fathers have refused to hearken to the ministers of Christ, must by no means be like them: as the authority of parents will not bear men out in iniquity, idolatry, superstition, unbelief, or impenitence.

CHAP. III.

Joshua stands before the Angel in filthy garments, and is resisted by Satan: but the Angel orders him change of raiment and a fair mitre, and gives him encouraging promises, 1—7. A prophecy of the Branch, and the Stone on which were seven eyes; with further promises, 8—10.

bitants of Jerusalem, were called on to rejoice and sing, because he would come and dwell among them; for he was "the Glory of his people Israel." But he was also to be "a Light to the Gentiles;" and many nations, in that day, would renounce their idolatry, and join themselves to the Lord as his worshippers, among whom he would dwell; and by this the Jews would know that the Lord of hosts had sent him to them. Let the reader attentively mark the language; "many nations shall be joined to JEHOVAH; and they shall be my people; and "I will dwell," &c. It is evident that JEHOVAH here speaks; yet he adds, "Thou shalt know that JEHOVAH of hosts hath sent me unto thee." It is the singular number. The prophet should know, that JEHOVAH of hosts had sent that person to him, who spake in the name of the Lord; not the people, that JEHOVAH had sent the prophet to them. It seems impossible that this language should be mistaken, except it be disregarded. Few passages, even in the New Testament, more clearly speak of distinct persons in the unity of the Godhead, than this does. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Gen. xvi. 10, 11, 13, 14, xviii. 1, 2, 33, xxxii. 30, xlviii. 16, Ex. iii. 2, xviii. 20—23.)—The day intended may either mean the time when the Gospel was first preached to the Gentiles; or that which will soon arrive, when the fulness of the gentiles shall come in. But the next verse evidently looks forward to the latter day: for then the Lord will inherit Judah, in his holy land, and again choose Jerusalem; having converted the Jews and brought them back to their own land. However, at both these times he would evidently be raised up out of his holy habitation, to plead the cause of his people against their enemies; and it would behoove all the fallen frail race of men to fear before him, and to adore these displays of his power, justice, truth, and love, with silence and submission, and without murmurs, objections, or opposition.—'Many were made proselytes to Judaism; the Edomites were converted in the time of John Hyrcanus.' (Bp. Newcombe.) The vanquished Edomites were indeed then compelled to be circumcised, and to profess themselves Jews. But can any man of reflection be satisfied with such an interpretation? Have not whole nations, and powerful nations, at least in an unexceptionable way, embraced Christianity? and are not more glorious times foretold? And does not this confirm, beyond reasonable doubt, that exposition which explains the prophecy of our Lord's coming and kingdom?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The great Builder of the Church, whatever instruments he employs, always works by line and rule; and he knows

AND^a he shewed me^b Joshua the high-priest^c standing before^d the Angel of the Lord,^e and^f Satan standing at his right hand to^g resist him.

2 And^h the Lord said unto Satan,ⁱ The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan: even the dimensions of his holy city, and all those who truly belong to it. But we may boldly apply to him for information about all interesting matters which perplex us: and by his gracious instruction, even the young and inexperienced will be made so wise in the most important concerns, that no man can without great sin despise their youth. The Church of God is so admirably constructed, that, after the millions which have already entered it, "there is yet room" for innumerable millions more: none shall be refused who trust in Christ; and he never excludes from the Church in heaven, one of the true members of the Church on earth. Our desire, prayer, and endeavour, then ought to be, that Jerusalem may be replenished with such numerous converts, that her present limits may be far too narrow, and that the suburbs of this holy city may become far larger than all her present dimensions are.—The inhabitants of Zion need fear no danger or disgrace, however exposed and despised they may be: seeing the Lord will be, "a wall of fire around them, and a glory in the midst of them." We should therefore in our several places circulate his proclamation far and near: that sinners, who are scattered in all parts of the globe, may be brought to separate from their wicked companions, to renounce idolatry, superstition, and iniquity, and join themselves to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, as his worshippers and servants. When he hath displayed his glory in purifying his Church, he will proceed to punish those who have spoiled her. Let all men therefore fear to harm his worshippers: for the least injurious touch will provoke his indignation; and if his wrath be kindled, yea, but a little, and he do but shake his hand over his enemies, misery and contempt will seize upon them; and all the world shall know that the Father hath sent the Son to be the Saviour of his people, and the terrible Judge and Avenger of all, who will not have him to reign over them. Let us then rejoice in his salvation, who now dwells in our nature and abides with his people perpetually: and to whom many nations have already been joined, and all the rest in due time will join themselves. May we be found a part of his chosen inheritance, and yield him a large revenue of praise, honour, and worship: and then he will own us for his portion, and be our Portion in his holy land above. And let all flesh tremble and adore before him: for though he now has taken up his residence in his holy habitation in heaven, and many are ready to inquire, "Where is the "promise of his coming?" yet he will soon arise, and make his cause triumphant, and punish his enemies; and he will ere long come to judgment, to complete the salvation of his people, and to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity.

enemies, caused many to think of them with astonishment. But they would surely be preserved; because One was in due time to arise from the remnant of Judah, of whom Joshua was a type, and who was called by the same name; (Joshua being the Hebrew, and Jesus the Greek, termination.) In due time the Lord would bring forth his servant, the BRANCH; namely, at his incarnation, when he would spring forth as a small branch from a decaying root, and yet grow up to supereminent dignity and glory. — The word, rendered wondered at, signifies not only a wonder, but also a sign, or a type. They are men intended as signs and tokens, they are typical men; “men that foreshew something to come.” They, with Joshua at the head of them, are a figure of the restoration of the Church under the government of the Messiah. I will point out the coming of the Messiah, as a person altogether distinct from Joshua, or any other present among you; and I will make him known under the name of the BRANCH. The word is rendered by the Septuagint, the cast, or sun-rising, from whence it is applied to Christ, (Luke i. 78;) and rendered the day-spring, (Louth.) How any learned man can suppose that Zerubbabel was exclusively meant, (when he was already brought forth, and placed as high in authority as at any future period.) would be astonishing; did not multiplied instances prove the difficulty with which very learned men discern the Saviour, in the clearest predictions and testimonies of Scripture. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9, 10. An allusion might here be made to some corner-stone or foundation stone of the temple, which had been laid under the inspection of Joshua, and in the presence of many of the people; and on which the names of the tribes of Israel perhaps were engraven. But the Lord called their attention to the true Foundation and Corner-stone of the spiritual temple, which he had laid in his purposes and prophecies, and which he would openly lay before the people, in his incarnation and by the Gospel; even Christ, as Immanuel, God and man. The seven eyes upon this stone are interpreted by many to signify the manifold and abundant wisdom and knowledge of Christ, as the Counsellor and ever-watchful Protector of his Church; or the manifold gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit; and some explain it of certain superior ministering angels, so called; but others suppose that they denote the attention which would be paid to this precious Corner-stone. The eyes of all believers from the beginning had looked forward to it, through types and predictions; those of all believers, both of the Jews and Gentiles, after Christ's coming to the end of the world, would be fixed upon it, in faith, hope, and love; wicked men would behold it with contempt, abhorrence, or dismay; and evil spirits would eye it with malignity and despair. In short, the eyes of all, in heaven, earth, or hell, would, in one way or other, or at one time or other, be fixed upon it.

The Lord of hosts would engrave the graving of this Stone, as the Corner-stone of the temple had been engraven: this seems especially to refer to the sufferings of Christ, through which he was prepared to be the Foundation and Salvation of the whole Church. On that one day, on which Christ was crucified for his people, a complete atonement was made for all their sins, and the way opened for their pardon, acceptance, and sanctification. And in that day, when sinners come to him, the tried Corner-stone, and obtain pardon, and spiritual life and grace from him, they begin to enjoy peace, and to live in harmony; calling upon one another to associate in religious exercises and in holy fellowship; while they rest under his protection and live upon his consolations; as men used to feast together upon the fruit and under the shade of their vines and fig-trees. This may perhaps have a special reference to that day, when the eyes of the Jews shall be fixed upon Christ, that precious Corner-stone which they have hitherto rejected. Then their load of national guilt shall at once be removed; and they shall enjoy spiritual peace and temporal security in their own land, as in the days of Solomon. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

If we could behold what goes forward in the world of spirits, we should see much to alarm, to humble, and to encourage us. The most honoured, eminent, and excellent of men, when viewed as standing before the Lord, would appear to be sinners deserving of condemnation, not only for their actual sins, but for the defilement of their best services: and Satan would be seen employing a vast variety of subtle and malevolent machinations, to defeat all our pious designs, and even, if possible, to procure our condemnation. But though we cannot answer the charges brought against us, yet our heavenly Advocate never wants an effectual plea, in behalf of all who entrust their cause in his hands. He will rebuke, confound, and silence our bold accuser, by arguments, grounded on his own meritorious obedience unto death, and on the mercy and truth of the Father through him. If it be proved, by our genuine conversion, that we belong to that company, whom he hath chosen, “that they should be holy and without blame before him in love,” we have nothing to fear. We were once as brands in the fire, without sense of our misery and danger, or desire of deliverance; and he plucked us out, of his own unsolicited mercy and grace, “according to the eternal purpose which he had purposed in himself;” and he will not now leave us to be thrown back into the burning, because of those remains of sin, which are our grief and burden, when we stand daily before him, confessing our guilt, entreating him to pardon and cleanse us, and prepared to give him all the glory of our salvation. If tinuous to build, and will himself complete, his spiritual temple. The small beginnings of his Gospel were despised by numbers: the feeble efforts that are made in different places to promote his cause, and the first dawning of his grace in new converts, are often contemned. Even the friends of the Gospel are apt to despise the day of small things: but they will all at length rejoice to see this great Builder carry on and complete his design; and to observe how the eyes of the Lord watch over the operations of his grace from first to last; whilst at length angels and men will count them the grand themes of their admiring praise and adoration.

V. 11—14. The prophet was still ignorant of the meaning of the two olive-trees, especially of those branches from which the oil was more immediately conveyed to the lamps: and upon inquiry he learned, that "they were the two anointed ones, which stood before the Lord of the whole earth." Zerubbabel and Joshua, the anointed ruler and high priest of Judah, who stood before the Lord, and were his instruments in the work of the temple, were the anointed Ones intended: but they were only types and shadows, (as the temple itself was,) of him that was to come. They therefore typified Christ, as anointed with the Holy Spirit without measure, to be the King and High-Priest of the Church, and to build, illuminate, and sanctify the spiritual temple. As the anointed High-Priest, he purchased these gifts by his sacrifice of himself, and through his intercession in heaven, they are communicated by him, as the anointed King of his Church. From the union of these two offices in his mysterious person, both God and Man, this inexhaustible fulness of grace is derived and conferred. Thus the olive-branches of themselves distil the golden oil, through the two golden pipes into the bowl: and from this fulness all receive that grace, which they require in their several places and services, through the means of grace, as the seven pipes fed the seven lamps of the candlestick. — It is plain, that the golden candlestick is the Jewish state, both civil and religious: and that the oil, with which the lights are supplied, is the Spirit of God." (Bp. Newcombe.) — And is it not equally plain, that Zerubbabel and Joshua were, in these transactions, typical persons, types of Christ our King and our High-Priest?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We are so dull, and so soon weary of attending on spiritual things, that the Lord must not only set them before us, but again and again by various methods awaken our attention. The Church contains all the knowledge, heliness, and consolation, which are to be found in this sinful world: and all this light comes from Christ, as its great source. He hath formed his candlestick on earth of the most valuable materials, and with the most exquisite workmanship; and he hath so arranged his word, his ordinances, his ministers, and people, that no part of the Church may be destitute of the light of life; and that the whole may shine as a light in the world.—Even when our ignorance or inattention deserve reproofs, if we ask wisdom of him, he will give us liberally, and not upbraid us. No human power or efforts can do good to the souls of men, except the Spirit of God work by them: nor can any authority or might prevent that good, which this divine Agent is pleased to do, often by feeble and unworthy instruments. To spread the Gospel, and to render men wise, holy, and happy, we do not so much need the assistance of mighty monarchs and powerful armies; or that of wealth, great abilities, eminent learning; or even the powers of philosophy, eloquence, and oratory: but we want men filled with the Holy Spirit, full of faith, heavenly wisdom, holiness, zeal for the glory of God, and love to the souls of men; who would go forth in simple dependence on the grace and providence of God, to use (no carnal weapons, but) the spiritual armour provided for them, and by fervent prayer to seek the blessing from him alone. Before such Zerubbabels mountains would become plains; or rather before Him, who hath said "Lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the world." As his instruments, they would begin and finish many a good work; even as he laid the foundation, and will in due time bring forth the head-stone, of his Church.—In the mean while, may we first give diligence to obtain the assurance that we are a part of the spiritual building; that we may both witness and partake of the blessing, when the whole company of heaven shall exclaim, "Grace, grace, unto it." Having this assurance, whatever we are called to engage in for the honour of God and the good of the Church, let us use every means diligently, but trust only in the Lord. Let us not be discouraged by mountains in the way, for faith and prayer will not fail to remove them: and let us hope for a happy event to all our endeavours. Nor let us despise the day of small things, either in respect of ourselves or others: for the Lord commonly produces great effects from small beginnings. Rather let us be thankful for every little hope, help, or success, or any little good done by us: let us rejoice to see instruments made active in the Lord's work, either in the magistracy, the ministry, or any other way. Especially let us fix our faith on Christ, and joyfully view him carrying on his work according to his own glorious plan, and daily bringing his spiritual edifice nearer to its completion; whilst the omnipresent and omniscient providence of God concurs with his grace, in perfecting the great vealed;) he was shown an ephah, or a measure about the size of a bushel: and he was told, that "this was their resemblance through all the earth," or the land. This was the form in which the ephah was made. On the top of the ephah was suspended a talent of lead, as a ponderous cover for it. In the ephah sat a woman, the emblem of the Jewish nation: and the angel cast something into the measure, which he told the prophet was wickedness; denoting that he kept an exact account of their sins, and would put them all with the nation into the measure, and only bear with the people 'till that should be full: for the emblem requires, and the language implies, that the wickedness put into the ephah should be distinct from the woman. At length the weight of lead was cast on the mouth of the ephah, by which the woman that sat in it, and the wickedness cast into it, would both be so closed up, as no more to be extricated. This seems to mean the condemnation of the nation, after the Jews had filled up the measure of their iniquities by crucifying Christ and rejecting his Gospel. The two women with wings like a stork, and the wind in their wings, seem to have been emblematic of the Roman armies, and their rapid conquests, coming speedily at the call of Christ to execute his righteous sentence on that devoted nation. And the lifting up of the ephah, and carrying it away through the air, to build it an house in Shinar, or Babylon, where it was to be fixed on its own base, so that its condition would for a long time remain unaltered, represents the taking of Jerusalem, the dispersion of the Jews like that made by the Babylonish captivity, and the long continuance of that calamity, as the just punishment of their sins, and by reason of their obstinate unbelief and rejection of Christ, to cleave to the works of their abrogated law and the superstitious traditions of their elders. It is observable, that the word Shinar signifies shaking out, and gives weight to this interpretation, which, in the grand outlines, seems very clear and satisfactory. The meaning of the vision seems to be, that the Babylonish captivity had happened on account of the wickedness committed by the Jews; and that a like dispersion would befall them, if they relapsed into like crimes." (Bp. Newcombe.) The language also implies, that it would be vastly more durable.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The full discoveries of the free grace of the Gospel, and the greatest encouragements given to repentance, faith, and evangelical obedience, tend to aggravate the guilt and enhance the punishment of those, who go on still in their wickedness. The tremendous curses of God's word go forth over the face of the whole earth: and they are continually falling upon the heads of the unjust and profane, according to the things written in the book of the law, and in the book of God's omniscience, who will never forget any of their works. While men seek to enrich their families by fraud, rapine, oppression, perjury, or other crimes; they open their doors, and admit the curse into their habitations along with their ill-gotten gains; and it will there remain, to the ruin of their substance, and the impoverishing of their posterity; while another part of the same curse will rest on their souls, and sink them into everlasting punishment. As we are all transgressors of the law, so we cannot escape this wrath of God, except we flee for refuge to the hope set before us in the Gospel. To give us space for this, the Lord endures our provocations with much long-suffering: but there is an appointed measure for every individual, (as well as for every nation), in which he sits, and into which all his wickedness is cast: and when he hath filled this measure, the Lord will shut him up under his heavy wrath, as with a talent of lead, and commission the executioners of his vengeance to carry him to his own place, there to assign him his long home, far from the city of our God, and among his enemies, as a vessel of wrath fitted for destruction. There will he be "established on his own base," and continue for ever a hater of God and holiness, and an object of his unchangeable and hot displeasure. Let sinners then fear to treasure up wrath against this day of wrath; for the more they multiply their crimes, the faster the measure fills: let them especially take heed not to oppose, despise, or neglect the great salvation of the Gospel; for this, above all other sins, hastens and ratifies the tremendous sentence; and whilst the day continues, "Let the wicked forsake his ways, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return to the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon."

NOTES.
 CHAP. VI. V. 1—3. ‘The two brazen mountains’ may be merely an ornamental part of the vision; or they ‘may denote God’s firm and immutable decrees, by which’ he governs the earth. ‘His righteousness is like great ° mountains.’ (Bp. Newcombe.) The emphasis laid on the mountains being mountains of brass, sufficiently proves, that something essential to the vision was intended. The four chariots are generally interpreted of the four great monarchies, the Chaldean, Persian, Grecian, and Roman, which successively executed God’s purposes of justice and mercy. As the red horses mentioned at first are afterwards omitted, it is supposed to be intimated, that the first of those monarchies was already subverted; and the bay horses, which are first joined with the grised, but afterwards mentioned separately, are supposed to denote the Goths, Vandals, &c. which subverted the Roman empire. But the reasons assigned for the different colours of the horses, from the different complexions, (so to speak) of these monarchies, do not give entire satisfaction. Certainly the Persian monarchy was more favourable to the Jews, than any of the others; and it does not seem to have been more fatal to other nations. And whatever favours Alexander the Great showed to the Jews, the sufferings of that nation, under some of his successors, especially Antiochus Epiphanes, exceeded all which they endured from the Babylonish captivity till the coming of Christ. The white horses, therefore, are not, in this respect, a proper emblem of the Grecian empire. Nor does it appear, for what end the Chaldean monarchy should be represented in a prophetical vision; seeing it was already destroyed. It seems then more obvious and satisfactory, to explain the passage to be descriptive of the providential government of God, as conducted by the ministration of angels according to his eternal purposes: and this with special reference to the affairs of the Jews and surrounding nations at that time, (Notes, 7—11.) Angels are called the Lord’s chariots; (Notes, Ps. lxxviii. 17. Ec. i. x.) By them he goes forth to execute his providential will on earth. The chariot with red horses may represent the execution of his vengeance, by raising up bloody conquerors to waste guilty nations: that with black horses the dreadful judgments of famine and pestilence, which often follow the desolations of war; the white horses may signify the removal of those judgments, by returning peace, health, and plenty; and the grised and bay may denote dispensations mingled with wrath and

mercy; or those lighter judgments that are more common in the world. (Notes, Rev. vi. 2—8.) Accordingly, the Angel interpreted the vision to signify “the four spirits ° of the heavens;” that is, celestial spirits, sent forth from God, to execute his purposes in the different parts of the earth. The red had already gone forth, and were executing their commission, in the wars by which the Persian kings wasted the Chaldeans and other nations in those parts: the black were about to follow them into the north-country; and then the white would go forth after them. But the grised were about to go towards the south, into Egypt, and other countries to the south of Judah: yet the bay, which were connected with them, sought to go to and fro through the earth, and obtained permission so to do. ‘Those which were represented by the bay, (not being designed to any particular place.) went forth to pass ° to and fro throughout the earth, to take charge of the ° Church of God, scattered in all parts of the world.’ (Bp. Hall.) At length the prophet’s divine Instructor informed him, that they who had gone towards the north-country had quieted his spirit respecting those regions: the judgments inflicted on those who had harassed the Jews, having satisfied the justice of God, he was appeased, and willing that peace should be restored.

Then cried, &c. ‘These words were uttered by God, ° appearing out of the Shekinah.’ (Lenth.) This is certainly a mere assertion: for the text contains no hint to that effect. The Angel, who talked with the prophet, evidently spake in this as well as former instances: and the passage unanswerably shows, that, according to the interpretation before given, this Angel was the Lord of Hosts, the mighty God, Emmanuel. Thus was concluded that succession of visions, which is continued from the first chapter to this place.

V. 9. Came, &c. ‘After the night, on which the ° eight foregoing visions were represented to the prophet.’ (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 10, 11. These persons seem to have come from Babylon, to present an oblation from the Jews at Babylon towards the building or decoration of the temple: but it is not certain whether they intended to continue at Jerusalem, or to return to Babylon. The prophet, however, was ordered to meet them on that very day at the house of Josiah, whither perhaps they were gone to present their oblation; and of them he was to take the silver and gold, and to make crowns. With these he was ordered to crown Joshua the high priest: not with respect to his purified the calling of the Gentiles into the Church, and the usefulness of many Gentile converts in promoting its extent, purity, and prosperity. These things would come to pass, "if they diligently obeyed the voice of the LORD," &c. — And ye of the Jewish nation shall be first sharers in the benefits arising from Christ's kingdom and priesthood, (and then those that are far off,) if you diligently hearken to the voice of God speaking to you, both by his prophets and by his Son. (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All the diversified events that take place in the world, spring from the unchangeable counsels of God, which are formed in unerring wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness. "His counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure;" — and none can stay his hand, or say to him, what dost thou? He might justly fill the earth with unmingled woe; but he moderates the severity of his vengeance, as far as consists with the honour of his justice, and when his judgments have "quieted his spirit," as provoked by man's daring rebellions. His angels delight in executing his mandates of wrath, or of mercy. While they seek to go forth, they wait his orders, and exactly conform to his will: and as we hope shortly to be equal to them, we should now study and copy their examples. If insuperable hindrances prevent men from giving personal assistance to pious and good designs, it is well, when they are willing to contribute towards them from their substance: and when such services spring from faith and love, they will remain for a memorial to their benefit in the temple of the Lord above. Yet nothing can be accepted of sinners, but what is presented in dependence on Christ, our Priest and King. For us men and for our Salvation he came down from heaven and became incarnate, and grew as a Branch out of a dry ground, till he arose to his pre-eminent dignity and glory; showing us, that humiliation and self-abasement are the first steps towards true glory and honour. To him, the great Builder, as well as Foundation, of the temple, all the glory belongs, and shall be rendered for ever. We must both submit to him as our King, trust in him as our Priest, and give him all the glory of our salvation; if we would have the new covenant ratified with us, and its blessed peace communicated to our hearts and consciences. Let us not think of separating what God hath joined together in his counsel of peace; for we cannot obey Christ as our King, unless we come to God by him as our Priest: nor come to God by him as our Priest, if we refuse to have him reign over us as our King. We have heard the Gospel of peace, through the blood of his cross, in these distant regions: but are we come to him and built on him, as a part of his spiritual temple, or are we yet the palace of Satan? Are we endeavouring to promote the purity and prosperity of this temple? or do we defile it by our sins? Certainly we can have no comfortable ground to think our peace made with God, unless we diligently endeavour to obey his voice, and keep his commandments.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1. This transaction occurred about two years after the visions recorded in the foregoing chapters: but the prophet doubtless continued to instruct and exhort the people during that time, though none of his predictions were recorded. Chisleu, the ninth month, answered to part of November and part of December.

V. 2, 3. The verb in the Hebrew is singular, "He had sent;" but our interpreters render it plurally, by an emallage of the number, which is frequent in the Hebrew; and the vulgar Latin interprets it to the same sense. According to this syntax, the words might be "as well translated thus, "When Sherazar, and Regemelech, and their men, sent unto the house of God." — These probably were men of some note among the Jews that still continued at Babylon. (Lowth.) Either the Jews in Chabla, or those in Judah, sent the persons here mentioned, with their attendants, to the temple, both to offer prayers in their behalf, and to propose a question to the priests and prophets, concerning some fasts which they had been used to observe. They kept an annual fast in the fourth month, in remembrance of the breaking down of the wall of Jerusalem; another in the fifth month, in remembrance of the burning of the temple; another in the seventh month, on the day on which Gedaliah was slain; and another in the tenth month, because at that time the siege of the city was begun. (Marg. Ref.) But the Jews now questioned, whether they ought to continue the observance of these fasts, seeing the city and temple were both in a fair way of being rebuilt. They had wept for their sins, and separated themselves from food and ordinary recreations and employments, that they might spend the day in devotions, and they had persevered in it for many years; but must they still thus deny themselves?

original? (Bp. Newcombe.) "The land of desire is for a desolation." The contrast is striking.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

If we would know the will of God in doubtful cases, we must not only consult his word and ministers, but seek his direction by fervent prayer. Some duties are obligatory at all times, and others belong to special seasons. It behooves those who are suffering or trembling because of their sins, to weep and fast, and separate themselves from lawful pleasures, to attend to the great business of humbling themselves before God, and seeking forgiveness: and it is equally seasonable for those who have experienced signal deliverances and special tokens of his reconciling love, to abound in praise, and in every expression of grateful joy. But most men rest in the outside of these religious exercises; and whether they fast and pray, or eat and drink, they do it to themselves, according to their own humour, or for their own honour or interest, in one way or other. Yet they are in general so pleased with their performances, that they think it hard that God will not richly reward what they "did not at all to him," and what in fact he abhors as the result of pride, selfishness, and hypocrisy! Nay, many, who with apparent conscientiousness inquire the truth and will of God, prove indisposed to embrace the one, or to practise the other. But the neglect of moral duties is as inconsistent with sincerity in religious observances, as the neglect of religion is inconsistent with the practice of morality, from a single eye to the glory and will of God. Our rule is, that "whether we eat or drink, or whatever we do, we do all to the glory of God;" and true Christians will aim to receive all with that thankfulness, and use all with that moderation which may render even their meals honourable to his name: but they will feel that they continually fall short of their rule, and need forgiveness in every thing. What then must be the case with them whose very religion is as selfish as their banquetings and revellings? Willful disobedience mars the prosperity of cities, and of apparently flourishing Churches; and no mourning or fasting under public or personal rebukes will prove of real use, except the ground of the Lord's controversy be removed. In this all his servants in every age are agreed. Except magistrates execute true judgment, and private persons do justice and show mercy and compassions to their brethren; except they cease to oppress the widow, the fatherless, the strangers, and the poor of every name or nation; except men repress their resentments, and forbear to imagine evil against their brethren in their hearts; they evidently refuse to hearken to the warnings of God's word, and to bear the yoke of his commandments; they increase the natural hardness of their stony hearts, by resisting convictions, and indulging their prejudices, lest they should hear the law and the words of the LORD by his Spirit in his prophets; and they cannot expect that even their prayers will turn away the great wrath of the Lord from them. He indeed always readily hears the cry of the broken-hearted penitent: yet it will soon come to pass, in respect of all who die impenitent and unbelieving, that "as he cried, and they would not hear, so they will cry, and he will not hear or help them." And then there will be no remedy, or refuge, from those miseries, which here they despised and defied, but which they then will not be able to endure. (Marg. Ref.)

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 2. The Lord had been exceeding jealous for his people, and displeased with their enemies; (i. 14.) and he had already in part avenged them on the Chaldeans and their other enemies, with great fury.— This is the general interpretation, but perhaps the verse, in this connexion, has another meaning. 'I have been jealous against Zion, with a vehement jealousy: and I have been angry against her with great fury.' Zion, the Church of the Jews, acted as an adulterous wife; and the calamities which she had endured were the effects of the Lord's jealousy and indignation: but he was now about to return to her in mercy. A grammatical rule of the Hebrew is indeed supposed to be contrary to this construction, but it certainly admits of exceptions. (Ps. cvi. 15.)

V. 3. A city, &c. That is, a city in which divine truth was known and believed; the true God worshipped in the appointed manner, and in sincerity; and where fidelity, as well as justice and equity, was practised among men. This primarily related to the state of Jerusalem, as reformed by Zerubbabel, Joshua, Ezra, Nehemiah, and others; yet it was typical of the Gospel-Church of true believers, which alone can fully answer to these characters.

5 And all the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls, ^a playing in the streets thereof.
 6 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, If it be ^a marvellous in the eyes of the remnant of this people in these days, ^b should it also be marvellous in mine eyes? saith the LORD of hosts.
 7 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, Behold ^a I will save my people from the east country, and from the west country: ^b 8 And I will bring them, ^c and they shall dwell in the midst of Jerusalem: ^d and they shall be my people, and I will be their God, in truth and in righteousness.
 9 ¶ Thus saith the LORD of hosts, ^a Let your hands be strong, ye that hear in these days these words by the mouth of ^b the prophets, which were in the day that the foundation of the house of the LORD of hosts was laid, that the temple might be built.
 10 For ^a before these days ^b there was no hire for man, nor any hire for beast; ^c neither was there any price to him that went out or came in, because of the affliction: ^a for I set all men every one against his neighbour.

 11 But now ^a I will not be unto the residue of this people as in the former days, saith the LORD of hosts.
 12 For ^a the seed shall be ^b prosperous; and the vine shall give her fruit, and the ground shall give her increase, and the heavens shall give their dew: and I will cause ^a the remnant of this people ^b to possess all these things.
 13 And it shall come to pass, that as ye were ^a a curse among the heathen, ^b O house of Judah, and house of Israel; so will I save you, ^c and ye shall be a blessing: ^d fear not, but let your hands be strong.
 14 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, ^a As I thought to punish you, when your fathers provoked me to wrath, saith the LORD of hosts, ^b and I repented not: ^c 15 So again ^a have I thought in these days to do well unto Jerusalem and to the house of Judah: ^b fear ye not.

V. 4, 5. These verses are beautifully descriptive of a state of great outward tranquillity, attended with plenty, temperance, and contentment. The inhabitants of the city are supposed to live to extreme old age, and to walk cheerfully and without fear in the streets; whilst their numerous descendants, being healthful and lively, free from want, fear or sorrow, amicably engage in their childish diversions on every side of them; a sight extremely pleasing to those aged spectators. 'The walls of Jerusalem were not dedicated, till above sixty years after this prophecy.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 6. (Marg. Ref.)
 V. 7, 8. This denotes the general restoration of the Jewish nation, from their several dispersions. The west country hath a particular reference to their present dispersion, great numbers of them having settled in the western parts of the world. They shall constantly serve and worship me, and I will bless and protect them. (Lowth.) The passage, in its full import, must be interpreted either of the Christian Church, or the future restoration of the Jews. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9—15. The Jews, who had heard and obeyed the words of Haggai and Zechariah, when they called them to build the temple, were encouraged to proceed in that work with vigour and alacrity. While this had been neglected, there had been no profitable employment for those who wished to subsist by the labour of their hands, or by that of their cattle; nor could they travel from place to place in safety, because of the calamities of the times; for the Lord had been provoked to leave them exposed to their enemies, and even to quarrel with each other. But he now intended remarkably to prosper them, beyond the example of all former days. Their lands should bring forth abundance, and they should possess it in peace; and the heathen, who had deemed them a contemptible, wretched, and accursed people, and treated them accordingly, beholding their wonderful deliverances and prosperity, should consider them as an honourable and happy nation. For as nothing could prevent the execution of his purposed wrath upon their fathers: so nothing should interrupt the course of his promised mercy towards them.—The consideration that all the nations, which now worship the true God and receive the Scriptures as his word, have derived all their knowledge in divine things, and all their privileges, under God, from Jewish prophets, apostles, and teachers; and that the Saviour, "in whom all nations shall be blessed," sprang from that favoured race, emphatically explains what is meant, when the Lord says, "Ye shall be a blessing." (Marg. Ref.) 'The mentioning of both Judah and Israel, which had been so long separated, shows that both the curse and the blessing here spoken of, in the ultimate sense, belong to the whole body of the Jews; who, as they are a public instance of God's judgments now, so shall they hereafter be of his blessings; viz. at the general restoration and conversion of the nation.' (Lowth.) It may be added, that this event will be "as life from the dead" to all the nations, and the Jews shall then indeed be a blessing.

V. 16, 17. (Marg. Ref.) Let those who believe these promises, show their faith by their works, and wait the fulfilment of them, in an obedient tenour of conduct, as magistrates and as private persons. The false oath might be loved, not only because of the gain acquired by it, but also from contempt of God, and enmity against him.

V. 19. Love the, &c. Or, "Ye shall love the truth and peace." As in many other similar passages, the implied exhortation is proposed in the form of a promise. (Note, Ez. xxxvi. 25-27.) Whilst the Jews had neglected the truths of God's words and his true worship, and whilst they deceived, defrauded, and quarreled with each other, God had given them occasion for mournful fasts: but he had now promised to change these into cheerful feasts, and he therefore exhorted them to love truth and peace, and he therefore exhorted them to love truth and peace, as the proper method of perpetuating their comforts and mercies.

V. 20-23. 'These verses refer to the great accession of converts, which the Jewish Church received, between the captivity and the coming of Christ; to the number of Christian disciples which the Jewish preachers made; and to the future conversions, of which the restoration of the Jews will be an eminent cause.' (Bp. Newcombe.) Notwithstanding all the miseries that the Jews had long endured, and the reproach and weakness which still attended them; it would at length come to pass, that numbers of persons from many cities would come to court their friendship. For the inhabitants of one city should go to those of another, purposely to persuade them to go with them without delay, to pray before JEHOVAH, the God of Israel, and to seek his favour, offering to accompany them in so doing. In this manner many people, yea, powerful nations, would come to Jerusalem to seek and worship JEHOVAH, and to lay hold on the skirt of a Jew; 'a gesture naturally used to entreat assistance and protection.' (Bp. Newcombe.) For they had been told that God was, in an especial manner, present with that people. This is indeed a clear prediction of the most extraordinary and unlikely event, which, at the time when Zechariah delivered it, could be imagined: namely, that many nations, powerful nations, renewed for arts and arms, for civilization and philosophy; nations, which had successively subjugated and oppressed Israel; nations, that had despised and ridiculed, with unbounded scorn, the worshippers of JEHOVAH; would at length learn religion from that very people! The Jews, when prosperous in their own land, were exceedingly prone to embrace the idolatries of the surrounding nations: what then could be more improbable, or more contrary to general observation, than that, after they had been crushed and enslaved, by successive conquerors, they should at length become teachers of true religion to their oppressors, and to the nations of the earth? Yet this is expressly foretold, with emphatical repetition and variation of circumstances! The term Jew, or Judean, became the more general national appellation, from the Babylonish captivity: and we have had repeated occasions to remark, that the prophets foretold the conversion of the Gentiles, in language taken from the stated religious worship of their own times. (Notes, Is. lxvi. 19-23. Ez. xl. 2.) It is, therefore, here evidently foretold, that at least ten times as many Gentiles would be converted to the true religion, as there were Jews, properly so called, among them at the time when the prophecy should begin to be fulfilled. The astonishing interposition of God in behalf of his people, at Babylon and Susa, &c. (Esther, iii-ix. Dan. ii-vi.) and the translation of the Scriptures into Greek, and the wide dispersion of them in that language, no doubt had considerable effects; but effects far beneath the language here used. For this certainly can mean nothing less, than that many powerful nations, of all languages, would renounce idolatry, become the worshippers of the God of the Jews, and learn the way of salvation from them, with the grand peculiarities of their religion: and that they would look up to the Jews, as a people peculiarly blessed by the presence and favour of God, and press with great earnestness to share their privi-

OHAP. IX.

Predictions of judgments on the Syrians, Tyrians, and Philistines, with intimations of mercy to a remnant, and promises of protection to the Jews, 1—3; of Christ's coming to Jerusalem riding on an ass's colt: and of the nature, extent, and benefits of his kingdom, and of the blood of his covenant, 9—12: of the victories obtained by the sons of the Church; their leges. This and much more is foretold: and accordingly it is an undeniable fact, that Greece and Rome, Egypt, and vast multitudes in Assyria, Persia, renowned countries both in the east and the west, by the propagation of the Gospel, renounced their idols, became the worshippers of JEHOVAH, and took the Jewish Scriptures as his sacred oracles. In process of time, whole nations embraced Christianity: and all the knowledge of the true God, and of true religion in the world, is derived from Judah, by the Saviour, the Glory of Israel and the Light of the Gentiles, through the writings and preaching of Jewish prophets, apostles, and evangelists: nor is there the least genuine knowledge of God in the world at this day, which may not be traced back to that source, and that method of communication. And, no doubt, when the Lord shall render his cause universally triumphant, all the ministers will draw their instructions from the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, the whole of which, (excepting Job,) were written by the descendants of Israel. For, though it pleased God to employ Gentile converts, as preachers, pastors, and teachers, in the primitive times, yet none were honoured as writers in the New Testament. And it is highly probable, that numbers of the converted Jews will be employed, and greatly prospered, in the future conversion of the Gentiles. Hitherto, however, the prophecy has been most wonderfully and exactly accomplished, and future events will no doubt throw still further light upon it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15.

The unchangeable love and faithful engagements of God to his people form their only and their sufficient security, that no enemy shall prevail against them, or injure them with impunity: and his gracious presence with his Church alone renders her worthy to be called "the city of truth" and "the mountain of holiness." Godliness and honesty conduce exceedingly to peace and prosperity in cities and nations. It is beautiful to behold the old and young living amicably and comfortably together; and we ought to be thankful to behold our children healthful and cheerful, and engaged in those diversions which suit their tender age, without any cause of terror or complaint: but it is most desirable to see "young men and maids, old men and children," with one accord joining in the worship and service of God, as citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem. If, in the present low state of vital godliness, we can scarcely conceive how such a change can be effected as to render it general all over the earth, let us not conclude that it cannot be: for it is no marvellous thing in the eyes of the Lord, that such a revolution should be effected; and the almighty power of his new creating Spirit could produce it in less time, than he was pleased to employ in creating the world. When he pleases thus to work, he will save multitudes in all parts of the world, and they will become citizens of his holy city, and his obedient people: and he will be their God in truth and righteousness: for while he performs his promises, and makes them partakers of his salvation, they will learn to serve him in righteousness and true holiness. Let then the hands of all those be strong, who are labouring to promote the cause of the Gospel; for while they attend to the words of his prophets and apostles, they may be sure that their labour will not be in vain. But let us not forget, that we best consult our own interest, by giving the service of God a decided priority in our choice and endeavours. When he is provoked by men's procrastination or negligence, he can cause trade to decay, and peace to remove, and set every man against his neighbour: but when he returns in mercy, peace and plenty result from his smile, and they become most prosperous, honoured, and happy, who were most abject and miserable.

V. 16—23.

While we rely on the Lord's promises, we ought also to consider what are the things that we ought to do. Surely Christians should remember the exhortation to "put away lying, and to speak every man truth with his neighbour;" to execute the judgments of truth and peace, to abhor all malice, fraud, and perjury; to hate what the Lord hates, and to love what he delighteth in. When they thus serve him, and he turns their mourning for sin into joy and gladness, and divine ordinances become their cheerful feasts, and they evidently love truth and peace; then they appear amiable, excellent, wise, and happy; their light shines before men; they adorn and recommend the doctrine of God our Saviour, and convince all around them that the Lord is with them of a truth: and thus supported and elevated, a cottage, a dungeon, a death-bed, a fiery furnace, or a lion's den, may be the scene of great peace and enjoyment. In this way the ancient servants of God attracted the attention and admiration of their heathen neighbours: thus they softened their prejudices, and insinuated themselves into their affections, whilst they saw what manner of men they were among them for their sakes; and so Christianity was diffused through many powerful and prosperous nations. The same cause would again produce the same effect: and when Christians shall generally cease from their sharp contentions, renounce unscriptural tenets and practices, and show their love of truth and peace in the whole tenour of their conduct, we may expect a more extensive spread of true religion, than any that yet hath taken place. In the mean time, let us stir up ourselves and each other, to go and pray before the Lord, and seek his face: let us strive to make known his truth in dark places, and to give weight to exhortation by example.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1. This chapter begins another prophecy, which reaches to the end of the eleventh: and it opens with predictions of judgments upon several nations bordering upon the Jews. This burden of the Lord first related to Hadrach: Syria is doubtless intended; but it is not certain whether Hadrach was the name of some idol, or of some place in Syria; or for what reason it was thus called. This burden, however, would fall, and rest, or abide on Damascus, the capital of Syria: and the prophecy was fulfilled by Alexander, who seized on immense riches in that city, and his successors, who governed it as conquerors: and it is not foretold of Damascus, as of Tyre, that the city should be destroyed. These events would take place, "when the eyes of man, as of all the tribes of Israel, should be toward the Lord;" which may denote, that these troubles would continue till the coming of Christ when the eyes of men in general, as those of all the tribes of Israel, should be fixed upon the true God, expecting help and salvation from him: and it might intimate, that the Syrians would not be delivered, till they were converted to Christianity and became worshippers of Israel's God. Or it may mean, that this burden would rest on Damascus, when the eyes of men, even of all the tribes of Israel, would be towards the Lord; by whom they would be protected, when their neighbours were reduced. When the Jews saw the conqueror approach, they looked to God and implored his protection: and Jaedua, the high-priest, met Alexander in his pontifical robes, who received him very graciously. Some learned men have endeavoured to show, that this and the two following chapters were not written by Zechariah, but before his time. Their arguments, however, do not bring conviction, to my mind at least. They urge, that it was not at all likely for Zechariah to predict the destruction of the temple, when encouraging the Jews to build it; (xi. 1.) but did not God, by Moses, predict the dispersion of Israel, while encouraging them to go up and possess the promised land? (Deut. xxviii--xxxii.) Did not the Lord foretel to Solomon the destruction of the temple, through the sins of the people, even when it had just before been dedicated? And did not Dani.], a considerable time before Zechariah began to prophesy, foretel the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, and the judgments of God on his people within seventy weeks; on the very day when his prayer was heard for the rebuilding of the temple, and the restoration of Jerusalem? (Notes, Dan. ix.) It is certain, that Tyre was very affluent and powerful, when Alexander the Great took and destroyed it: and why should not that judgment, and not the desolations by Nebuchadnezzar, be predicted? The arguments, indeed, adduced in favour of this opinion, would not have been much noticed, had they not been sanctioned by eminent names: but, one thing above all others, satisfies my mind, that the opinion is unfounded; namely that they who do not allow, that Zechariah delivered these predictions, are not agreed to whom they should be ascribed, or what date to assign them. Some argue that Jeremiah was the writer of them; but others carry back many parts of them to a far earlier period. In fact, the whole book has been ascribed to Zechariah by the Jews, in every age: and it is rather remarkable, that some, who frequently suppose errors of transcribers, and propose conjectural amendments, should be influenced by what probably was an error of a transcriber, (Note, xi. 12—14. Matt. xxvii. 9,) to assign part of this book to Jeremiah, or to some preceding prophet, contrary to the constant tradition both of the Jewish and Christian Church.

V. 2—4. Hamath bordered on Syria on one hand, and Tyre and Zidon on the other, and they would share her burden. The Tyrians deemed themselves exceedingly wise; they had strongly fortified the city upon the island, since Nebuchadnezzar had destroyed that upon the continent; and they were become extremely rich by their industry and commerce. But the Lord meant to reject and impoverish them, and to destroy the strong holds that were built in the sea, as well as their naval force, and to burn the city with fire. This was fulfilled by Alexander. (Notes, Is. xxiii. Ez. xxvi. xxvii. xxviii.) "New Tyre" was built on an Island, at the distance of half a mile from the shore: so its situation was very strong, and it was fortified with a wall round it one hundred and fifty feet high. By her merchandise she had gathered immense riches. The Carthaginians were not able to assist her with their naval forces. (Louth.) "Her power in the sea" may signify the strength of her insular situation: and this distinguishes the Tyre taken by Alexander from that destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar. (Note, Ez. xxvi. 14.) The carnage made by Alexander, when he took Tyre, the multitudes sold for slaves, and likewise the entire desolations of the city, fix the fulfilment of the prophecy to the latter event: and the fall of Tyre must prove ruinous to Zidon.

7 And I will take away his blood out of his mouth, and his abominations from between his teeth: but he that remaineth, even he, shall be for our God, and he shall be as a governor in Judah, and Ekron as a Jebusite.

8 And I will encamp about mine house because of the army, because of him that passeth by, and because of him that returneth: and no oppressor shall for pass through them any more: for now have I seen with mine eyes.

9 Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem: Behold, thy King cometh unto thee: he is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass.

10 And I will cut off the chariot from Ephraim, and the horse from Jerusalem, and the battle-bow shall be cut off: and he shall speak peace unto the heathen: and his dominion shall be from sea even to sea, and from the river even to the ends of the earth.

V. 5, 6. The Philistines, having witnessed the desolations of Tyre, would be greatly alarmed and distressed, even in their capital cities. Perhaps they had hoped, that Tyre would stop the progress of Alexander's victories, and that they should have escaped: but they would be made ashamed of these expectations, and find themselves exposed without defence to the power of the conqueror. Then the king would be destroyed at Gaza; Ashkelon would be reduced to desolation; either some base person would be made ruler over Ashdod, or the city would be given to be inhabited by a colony of strangers; and thus the pride of the Philistines would be cut off. 'Gaza was taken by Alexander after a two months' siege; ten thousand of the inhabitants slain; and the governor, Betis, dragged round the city till he was dead. King is a general word for any governor. Strabo, speaking of Gaza, says, It was formerly a city of note, but was destroyed by Alexander the Great, and remains desert and uninhabited.' (Acts viii. 16.) (Louth.) When Gaza was thus taken and destroyed, the other cities of the Philistines fell into the hands of the conqueror, and probably experienced little favour at his hands; and especially some stranger, not a native of the country, had authority in Ashdod. 'The family of Israel shall dwell in Ashdod, who before were in it as strangers.' (Chaldee paraph.) The Maccabees conquered Ashdod: and the Philistines are not mentioned in the New Testament, but their country seems to have been possessed by the Jews.

V. 7. The Philistines and other enemies of the Jews would be deprived of their power to waste them any more; and the spoil, which they had taken by the most bloody and abominable murders, or rapines, would be torn from them, as the prey from between the teeth of a wild beast. Yet there would be a remnant, who would embrace the true religion, and become the people of God, devoted to his service: and they would be honoured even as the governors of Judah, and the inhabitants of Ekron would be privileged as a Jebusite, or a citizen of Jerusalem; as some Jebusites, whom David perhaps proselyted and incorporated among his people, when he took Jerusalem. Araunah, on whose threshing-floor David was ordered to sacrifice, and on which the temple was afterwards built, was a Jebusite; but his conduct showed the spirit of a genuine Israelite. Many Philistines might be proselyted to the Jewish religion, at or after the times of the Maccabees; but their conversion to christianity was principally intended. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8. While the Macedonian conquerors were extending their ravages; and afterwards while the successors of Alexander, that reigned in Syria and in Egypt, were continually marching their armies through Judea, in their wars with each other; the Lord promised to encamp round his temple, to protect it from being plundered and destroyed: for he had seen the oppression of the Chaldeans and others, and he would watch over it, to protect it from similar depredations. Antiochus Epiphanes was permitted to profane the temple and to persecute the Jews: but this was only for a short time, and not like the desolations of the Chaldeans; and it ended in the honour of the Jews, and the disgrace and ruin of their persecutors: so that no such oppressor as Nebuchadnezzar passed through them any more; that is, till after Christ was come and rejected, when they ceased to be the people of God. But the passage no doubt refers to events yet future, which will more signally accomplish it. How can this suit the times before the captivity?

Seen, &c. 'My eye hath pervaded future events, and hath thus determined.' (Bp. Newcombe.) 'For I have well noted and pitied thy late affliction.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 9, 10. 'From the promise, contained in the foregoing verse, of God's protecting his Church and temple, the prophet, in a sudden transport, takes occasion to break forth into a joyful representation of the coming of the Messias. He is righteous, and the Saviour. It is plain from the Gospels, that the Jews, in Christ's time, understood this prophecy of the Messias. For when our Lord applied it to himself, by entering into Jerusalem upon an ass, it so affected the multitude, that they spread their garments and palm-branches in the way: nay, his disciples took occasion from this sight to rejoice, and praise God with a loud voice.' (Louth.) (Marg. Ref.) All the preceding deliverances of the Jews were types of the blessings to be conferred on the Church under the reign of the Messias, or introductory to them. The daughter of Zion was therefore called on to rejoice greatly and shout for joy, because her long expected King was about to come unto her. (Marg. Ref.) When he appeared, he would be perfectly just and holy in his character and public administration; yea, he would honour the divine law and justice in the salvation of his people. Though the most honourable and mighty of all the kings and conquerors, that ever appeared on earth, he would display none of that magnificence and grandeur, by which they generally are distinguished. On the contrary, humility and lowliness would mark his deportment; poverty and outward meanness his circumstances; and contempt and insult would be his lot on earth. On the single occasion, in which he would at all assume the character of a King; on the memorable occasion, when he would enter Jerusalem amidst the Hosannas of the multitude, (who would soon after as loudly demand his crucifixion,) he would for once ride; not on a stately steed gorgeously caparisoned, or in a triumphal car; but on an unbroken untractable creature, an ass's colt! a proper emblem of the ungovernable nature of those over whom he came to reign; but whom his powerful grace renders submissive and obedient, even as his miraculous energy made this animal go on undismayed and guidable, amidst the clamorous joy of the surrounding multitudes. Even this ass's colt was not his own, as Man, but borrowed; nor was it fily prepared to be ridden on, but merely with the clothes of the disciples cast loosely upon it. In every respect the divine majesty and dignity of this King were contrasted with the unexampled manner, in which he was received into the holy city that was typically the capital of his mighty kingdom. Then the Lord intended to deprive both Jews and Israelites of all carnal confidences; to terminate the contentions among such as submitted; and to destroy all the force and power of those who rebelled against him. And at the same time he would send his Gospel of peace among the heathen, reconciling them to God and to each other, and inducing them to submit to Messiah's dominion, until it should at length extend, not only all over the land, but to the utmost borders of the earth. (Marg. Ref.) 'As horses are used in war, Christ may be supposed by this action to have shown the humble and peaceable nature of his kingdom. Ephraim and Judah shall not engage in war to spread the Messiah's kingdom; but their spiritual King shall peaceably convert the Gentiles, and shall extend his dominion every where.' (Bp. Newcombe.) The beginning of the tenth verse may be rendered, "For I will cut off, &c." Both Israel and Judah had been exceedingly prone to rely on chariots and horses; but the ruin of these confidences by the calamities of successive ages would introduce the reign of that meek and righteous King and Saviour, who would enter Jerusalem riding on an ass's colt. 'By these places, ("from sea to sea, &c.") 'the Jews knew that he meant 'an infinite space and compass over the whole world.' (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11. 'The prophet, speaking in the name of God, directs his discourse to the Church of the faithful; for 'the pronoun and affixes are feminine.' (Louth.) 'As 'for thee, O Zion, whose covenant with me is made and confirmed by the precious blood of the Messiah, I do 'herein give thee a type of thy future deliverance from all 'thy spiritual miseries, in that I have brought forth thy 'captives out of the miserable captivity at Babylon.' (Bp. Hall) 'The restoration from the Babylonish captivity, 'and the great future restoration, may both be foretold.' (Bp. Newcombe.) The bondage of Egypt, from which the Israelites were delivered by the sprinkling of the blood of the paschal Lamb; and that from which they had just been restored, were like pits or dungeons, in which was no water; where they were sinking in the mire, or perishing for want by a lingering death; and both these deliverances were granted in virtue of the engagement of Christ to shed his blood for his people. But these only shadowed forth the deliverance of sinners from the bondage of sin and Satan, and from the sentence of condemnation under which they lay; and numbers have been from age to age sent forth from their gloomy bondage in the pit where is no water, by the blood of the Redeemer's covenant; and saved from that horrible pit, where not a drop of water can be had to cool the burning tongue of those who are tormented in the flame. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12. This may be considered as an address to the Jews that still remained in Chaldea: they were prisoners; yet the favour shown them by the Persian kings, and especially these promises and predictions, rendered them prisoners of hope. Let them then without delay return to Zion, as the strong-hold prepared for them; assured that God would render their prosperity double to what their adversity had been, or double to all the advantages which they could relinquish for this purpose; for he had that day solemnly declared it. Yet it is also an address to the prisoners of sin and Satan, who, having such a Saviour preached to them, may hope for liberty and felicity: let them then turn to Christ, and in him the power, truth, and love of God will be their strong-hold: and let them expect joys and comforts double both to all their sorrows, and to all their sinful pleasures. (Marg. Ref.)

Prisoners of hope. 'A beautiful address, as God when 'he doomed his people to banishment by no means totally 'rejected them.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 13—16. When Judah had been prepared by a revival of true religion to be as a beut bow in the Lord's hand; when Ephraim or the remnant of the ten tribes should be made as arrows, to fill the bow, and to be employed against his enemies; when Judas Maccabæus, and his followers the sons of Zion, should be raised up against Antiochus Epiphanes and his armies, who were of Grecian extraction, and they should become terrible as the sword of a mighty man to their oppressive assailants; then the Lord would be seen over them, as the eagle hovers over and protects her young; and his arrows would be piercing and destructive as the lightning: then he would blow the trumpet of alarm, to call the Jews to the standard, and they would bear down all before them, as the whirlwinds do in the southern deserts. While the Lord should thus defend them, they would consume their enemies, and destroy them with sling-stones, as David did Goliath: they would celebrate their victories with every expression of joy, and their exhilaration and acclamations of gratitude would be so great, that they would resemble those that make a noise through wine; and be filled with all good things, or with holy consolations, as the bowls used for the drink-offerings (or the corners of the altar into which a part of it was poured,) were with the wine. Thus the Lord would take care of them as his flock, and count them precious as the jewels of his crown, and set them up as an ensign for the Jews to flock to, who had been dispersed by the persecutions of Antiochus. Others, however, interpret the passage of the apostles and the preachers of the Gospel, in the primitive ages. They were prepared for their work, as the Lord's bow and arrows; they were raised up to oppose the idolatry, iniquity, and proud science of Greece and Rome; and they were as swords in the hand of a mighty man. Wherever they went, the Lord evidently attended them: his word from their lips, (like an arrow from the bow,) penetrated the hearts and consciences of the hearers. The blowing of the Gospel-trumpet called together increasing numbers, who, with accumulated weight, beat down before them the empire of idolatry and wickedness. They were marvellously defended, in the midst of persecuting foes by the power of God; they gained surprising victories by faith and prayer; they drank abundantly of divine consolations, and were "filled with the Spirit" as consecrated vessels. (Eph. v. 18.) They were saved by the good Shepherd as his flock, and honoured and valued as his jewels and crown; and multitudes continually resorted to them as his ensign, to enlist as soldiers in the army of Jesus Christ. The former interpretation may very well be admitted as typical of the latter; and thus both may stand. Alexander the Great is called the king of Javan, or Greece, (Dan. viii. 21.) I will animate the Jews against the troops of Antiochus.' (Grotius.) It is true that Judas Maccabæus gained some advantages over the Syrians; but the language of this prophecy seems too strong for these events; and may remain to be fulfilled against the present possessors of the countries called Javan, which were Greece, Macedonia, and part of Asia minor. (Bp. Newcombe.) This may be the case, but the context favours the preceding interpretation.

V. 17. The goodness of God would appear admirable, in the protection and successes of the Jews above mentioned: but still more in the redemption of sinners by Jesus Christ, and the success of the Gospel among the benighted Gentiles. The free mercy and plenteous grace, the tender compassion and love of Christ to rebels and enemies, in the whole of his salvation, pass all knowledge; and every deep contemplation upon them must issue in admiration. At the same time his beauty, or the excellency and glory of all the divine perfections, as harmoniously displayed in the person and work of Christ, is equally admirable with his goodness; for, justice, holiness, truth and wisdom, are as conspicuous as mercy, in this grand concern. This therefore may be supposed to be the principal object which the prophet had in contemplation, when he thus anticipated the admiring praises of the Church in the predicted times. Yet those temporal successes may here also be considered as shadows of this spiritual redemption; and therefore the plenteous gifts, graces, and consolations of the Spirit afforded to believers of every description at and after the day of pentecost, were represented under the allusion of young persons made exceedingly cheerful by an abundance of temporal provisions: as when pinching penury is succeeded by plenty of every thing conducive to enjoyment; or as when injuries are celebrated by feasts and rejoicings. (Marg. Ref.) (Notes, Cant. ii. 4, 5. v. i. Joel, ii. 28—32. Acts ii. 17, 18.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—3.

Dreadful will be the case of those on whom the burden of the word of the Lord shall rest, at that solemn season, when the eyes of all the race of men shall be fixed on him, as come to judge the world in righteousness. May our eyes now be fixed on him, in faith, hope, and love, as becomes the true Israel of God! All other wisdom will soon prove folly; all other strong-holds, except the name of the Lord, will be cast down; and all the wealth that men have gloried and confided in, will become contempt-

V. 9—17.

Let all who love the Lord rejoice with loud acclamations in Zion's King; in his majesty and meekness, in his purity and compassion, in his righteousness and salvation; and whilst we admire, and confide in his lowliness, equity, truth, and love, may we transcribe them into our own conduct. Let us "not mind high things, but condescend to men of low estate;" and be content with poverty and mean accommodations; let us compassionate the indigent and the unworthy, and be willing and guidable in every service; lest we should be sent to learn docility and submission from the ass's colt. We should be thankful, that the Son of God came not with the weapons and the terrors of war; but with the words of mercy and peace; that being pardoned and reconciled to God, and rescued from our former usurping lords, and renouncing our carnal confidences, we may be his willing subjects, and heartily desire that his dominion may be extended throughout the earth. For through the precious blood of his covenant, the poor prisoners of Satan are set at liberty from the horrible pit, in which they must otherwise have perished without hope or comfort. And if we be thus escaped, and have our feet set upon the rock, and a new song put into our mouths, let us call to our fellow sinners, "as prisoners of hope," to turn to the same strong-hold, assured of an abundant recompense. Sharp have been the conflicts, vast the exertions, and extensive the conquests of Zion's sons, whom the Lord hath raised up, qualified, and employed in the spiritual warfare against his proud despisers, in former ages: and whenever he thus makes any of them as polished shafts in his hand; when he animates them with courage, faith, and zeal; when he helps them to cast off the works of darkness, and to put on the armour of light; he will assuredly go with them to the combat, and give them a measure of the same success. Let us then sound the trumpet of the Gospel, and take the sling and stone of faith and prayer, the sword of the Spirit, the helmet of salvation, and the whole armour of God; and we shall be able to face any Goliath, who shall defy the armies of our Immanuel. And whilst we drink abundantly of his divine consolations, and are filled with the Spirit, we shall be joyful under every hardship, and bold in all dangers. For the good Shepherd will save his purchased flock from every wolf and lion that assaults them. He will preserve every redeemed sinner as a bright jewel in his glorious crown, and set him as an ensign, by which to bring others to enlist themselves in his armies. And the more we are employed, honoured, comforted, and satisfied with the plenteousness of his house, the more we shall admire, love, and praise his goodness and his beauty, which all heaven adores and celebrates, as revealed in the face of our Redeemer. May we "behold his glory as in a glass, till we are gradually changed into the same image, by the Spirit of our God."

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1. The spiritual blessings promised in the preceding chapter had been shadowed forth under allusions to temporal plenty; and the people were therefore reminded, that they must ask them from God. As rain is essential to the fruitfulness of the earth, they were directed to pray for it in its ordinary seasons: and so the Lord would make bright clouds, either such as are fore-runners of rain, or such as are bright by the lightnings which accompany it; and then every field would produce grass, or other vegetables, in plenty. This may be considered as an exhortation to the people and the preachers of the Gospel, to seek the fructifying influences of the Holy Spirit by faith and prayer, without which no means can be successful.

hand, according to the prophecy of Zechariah, "Open thy doors, O Lebanon, &c." (Lowth.) This story shows, at least, what event the ancient Jews supposed to be here foretold. Lebanon may either signify the temple built of cedars from that mountain; (Marg. Ref.) or the city filled with haughty and prosperous inhabitants, and with stately mansions like the cedars of Lebanon. This must therefore be a prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple by the Romans; for there were no ravages, from the time of this prophet to that event, answerable to the expressions, and the whole context leads our thoughts to the days of Christ. In the former chapter, the future conversion of the Jews was predicted; in this, the manner by which they would be reduced to their present dispersed condition was described. After a time, the nation would fill up the measure of their iniquities; and then the country would be laid open to the Romans, and they would destroy Jerusalem and the temple, as a conflagration would devour the cedars of Lebanon. The persons of inferior power, or nations less distinguished than they, may be intended by the fir-trees and oaks of Bashan, who were ordered to hew because the cedars were fallen: Jerusalem, and the nation of Israel, had been fenced, planted, and tended as a vineyard, whence a vintage was expected; but it was become an unfruitful fore t, and it would be hewn, or burned down to the ground. Or, "the defenced forest." (Marg.) may mean Jerusalem, with its strong fortifications. The princes, priests, and scribes, would howl in madness and despair, at seeing all their honour, authority, wealth, and prosperity, torn from them: and all the principal persons would roar like enraged lions, driven from their coverts by an inundation of Jordan, when it desolated the neighbouring fields, which were as the pride of that river. For thus would the Romans expel these oppressors, when they wasted the land.

V. 4-6. It is evident that the prophet performed several symbolical actions, as typical of the events predicted: but doubtless Christ was here especially intended. The Father, (whom as Man he acknowledged to be the LORD his God,) appointed him as the good Shepherd to feed the flock, just before it was given up to the slaughter. "He came to seek and save the lost;" and his personal ministry was among "the lost sheep of the house of Israel." His labours, doctrines, and miracles, were calculated to reform and preserve the people: yet they eventually occasioned their ruin, and he seemed to feed them for the slaughter. Their rulers and teachers, who bore the pastoral office, deceived, oppressed, and devoured the people, without shame or remorse: nay, they boasted of their own righteousness, and hypocritically praised God for making them rich; as if he had concurred in their unmerciful oppressions! Therefore the Lord determined to show them no more pity than they had done the people: and as the nation in general was extremely corrupt, and concurred in rejecting Christ: so he would involve them in one common calamity, (except "a remnant according to the election of grace:") and the people would both be given up to destroy one another by furious intestine dissensions, and be left in the power of the Roman emperor, whom they acknowledged as their only king, when they demanded the crucifixion of Christ their true King. (Marg. Ref.) Idolatry is not here mentioned among the sins of the Jews, in the times predicted; but covetousness and hypocrisy are specified; which, with the context, fully proves, that the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans was intended. "He noteth the hypocrites, which have ever the name of God in their mouths, though in their life and doings they deny God! attributing their gain to God's blessing, which cometh of the spoil of their brethren." "Ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayers; therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation." Some suppose the Romans, when selling the captive Jews for slaves, to be meant: but the language far better suits the covetous, oppressing, hypocritical scribes and pharisees. The Jews presumptuously expected, that God would deliver his worshippers, city, and temple, from the Roman idolaters: they had no prophets sent to declare the contrary, (as in the siege of the city by the Chaldeans;) and they had forgotten or explained away these ancient predictions, and scorned the warnings of Christ and his disciples. But the event, and their condition for above seventeen hundred years, have abundantly shown the fallaciousness of their hopes.

sonally, and by his apostles, would feed the flock of slaughter; but his attention would chiefly be directed to the poor of the flock, among whom a remnant would be preserved from the common ruin of the nation. Some by "the flock of slaughter," understand the poor and oppressed, who were "counted as sheep for the slaughter" by their cruel oppressors. As an emblem of this, it is probable that the prophet took two staves, such as were generally used by shepherds: one of these he called "Beauty;" by which was meant the honour, privilege, and ornament, that the Jews possessed, according to their national covenant, in the oracles, instituted worship, and temple of God: and especially by the ministry of Christ and his apostles, who preached the Gospel to them first. The other he called "Bands," denoting the connexion of the nation under one government, and the harmony that had in some measure hitherto united them, as the flock of God. (Notes, Ez. xxxvii: 14-23.) But it would soon appear, that they would not profit by the doctrine and ministry of Christ, but would choose to adhere to false teachers in preference: and he would therefore cut off three Shepherds in one month. Some explain this of the three leading sects among the Jews, the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Herodians: others, of their rulers, priests, and scribes, who were three orders of pretended shepherds, and were all degraded and cut off suddenly. "One month" seems a proverbial expression for a short time. (Louth.) They were set aside, when the apostles were commissioned and sent forth to preach: they were destroyed by the Romans, the executioners of the Lord's vengeance. For his righteous soul loathed their pride, hypocrisy, and wickedness, and they as much abhorred his holy character, doctrine, and precepts. He therefore gave them up, and would feed them no more: but left them unprotected, to destroy one another and be destroyed of their enemies; and to perish in their sins, without good instruction, or those means of grace which they had abused. "Loathed, or, straitened." (Marg.) "I have a baptism to be baptized with; and how am I straitened till it be accomplished." Or grieved. "He was moved with indignation, being grieved at the hardness of their hearts." — The word, translated abhorred, is not met with elsewhere in Scripture. "It has this sense in the Syriac." (Bp. Newcombe.) The Septuagint renders it, "Their souls" went against me," or rushed upon me: a striking prediction of the fixed and virulent purpose of the most distinguished orders among the Jews, with all their policy, power, and influence to procure the death of Christ.

The horrid circumstance of the Jews, during the siege of Jerusalem, eating, and even quarrelling about, the flesh of their brethren and children, should not here be forgotten.

V. 10, 11. These events seem to have been prefigured, by the prophet's cutting asunder his staff, or crook, called Beauty, when he had delivered this part of the prophecy. This signified the abolition of the national covenant with Judah and Israel, who would be deprived of all those distinctions which had been their glory and beauty; which virtually took place when they rejected and crucified Christ. For them, as a nation, they ceased to be God's peculiar people, and their ordinances lost their efficacy, "waxed" old, and were ready to vanish away;" and the poor of the flock, those who waited on Christ, knew that this was the word of the Lord. They soon learned that the Jews were no longer to be the peculiar people of God, and so they separated from among them, when they saw the Roman armies about to besiege Jerusalem, being well aware of the event.

V. 12-14. This evident prophecy of a transaction recorded in the New Testament is expressed with much obscurity, as indeed might previously have been expected. It is probable that the prophet performed some symbolical action of this kind before the rulers and priests, as a type of Christ, and as showing by what means the Jews would seal their own condemnation. He demanded his wages for feeding the flock, if they thought good to give him it; and he received thirty pieces of silver, probably shekels, of about the value of half a crown or three shillings each. These the Lord directed him to cast unto the potter; disdaining that he or his shepherd should be valued at so paltry a sum: and accordingly the prophet cast them to the potter in the house of the Lord; either the potter came thither for that purpose, or he was at work near the temple. This predicted the bargain of the chief priests with Judas for that very sum, to betray Christ into their hands, the traitor's returning their money in horror of conscience, and their determining to purchase with it a potter's field to bury strangers in. Then their Shepherd brake the other staff called Bands, that he might break the brotherhood betwixt Israel and Judah; which denoted the dissolution of their civil and ecclesiastical state, and that the people would be given up to the most destructive and furious contests with each other. Some suppose that the whole was merely a vision, which the prophet reported to the people: but it is recorded as a transaction, or a direct prophecy; and not as a vision. (Notes, Hos. i.) The rulers and priests giving thirty shekels, as the wages of the prophet; the contempt thus shown to God himself; the money being thrown back by him that received it; and its eventually being given to the potter, are circumstances sufficiently strong to show, that St. Matthew does not accommodate the passage, but gives us the real meaning of the Holy Spirit in it, though some other circumstances do not coincide. And the awful and affronting nature of the messages and predictions in this chapter, and towards the close of this book, give additional weight to the opinion, that this prophet was "Zecharias the son of Barachias, whom the Jews slew between the temple and the altar;" and his blood, the last of the innocent blood thus shed till the coming of Christ. (Note, i. 1.) The name of Jeremiah stands in our versions of the New Testament, but many learned men, on very probable grounds, are of opinion, that no name was originally in the text. "Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by the prophet, 'saying, &c.'" (Note, Matt. xxvii. 9.) - Brotherhood, &c. I cannot explain this passage, without supposing, 'that the kingdom of Israel subsisted, when the prophet wrote it; and that the wars between Judah and Israel are referred to.' (Bp. Newcombe.) But do not many prophecies, allowedly written long after the captivity of the ten tribes, and predicting the times of the Messiah, thus mention Judah and Israel separately? Does not Ezekiel foretel, among other things, the final restoration of the Jews, as introduced, under the emblem of two sticks uniting in his hand, signifying, so to speak, the miraculous reunion of the staff Bards, after it had been thus broken? (Notes, Ez. xxxvii. 12 23.) And what connexion had the wars between Judah and Israel with the betraying and crucifying of Christ? The principal calamities of the race of Jacob began when they divided into two kingdoms: on their return from captivity they all formed one people: but after their rejection of Christ, internal discords, far more fierce and more speedily destructive than the wars between Judah and Israel, hastened the fatal catastrophe of the nation. This is quite sufficient for prophetic language. "The Lord said a goodly price, &c." God was despised in the person of his prophet: but the Lord of Hosts himself also was sold for this small sum!

V. 15-17. Thus far the prophet had typified the great and good Shepherd: but now, when his people were cast off, he was ordered to take the instruments of a foolish shepherd; as an emblem of the infatuated rulers and blind guides, whom Providence would then place over the nation. From the time that they rejected Christ, and he rejected them, they would have rulers, priests, and prophets, of one sort and of one heart, (as if they had formed one shepherd,) to oppress, devour, deceive, and ruin them, both in respect of soul and body. But wo to this idol-shepherd, that left off to feed the flock, and attended to nothing but eating their flesh, and disabling them from resistance by tearing their claws to pieces. Such an one resembles a shepherd, as an idol does a deity: the idol receives the homage, oblations, and sacrifices, but disappoints the deluded worshipper to his ruin: and the idol-shepherd has the garb and appearance of a shepherd, receives submission, and is supported at much expense; but he leaves the flock to perish through his neglect, or leads them into ruin by his example. Therefore the sword of the divine vengeance would rest on his arm and right eye, to wither the one, and utterly to darken the other: for a total deprivation of power and authority, and an entire judicial blindness, would make way for his total ruin. This referred to the proud, blind, and hardened scribes, pharisees, priests, and rulers, of the Jews; and to what company of men, in any age, can either the character, or the threatened judgments on them and their successors and disciples, be applied with more exact and discriminating justice?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1-11.

The admission of wickedness into communities opens a door to a fire that will consume their prosperity, however great it may be: and the tremendous doom of Jerusalem may well alarm other degenerate churches, as the fall of the cedar might cause the fir-trees and oaks of Bashan to howl. If any part of the Lord's vineyard prove an unfruitful forest, it must be cut down and cast into the fire: and those who have been pre-eminent in rank and office, will have the precedence in suffering, when all their glory and pride shall be spoiled: and in such a state of the community, the best methods of reformation often excite such contempt, enmity, and opposition, that they hasten its downfall. Alas! many who possess authority in the Church, only consider what gain they can make of their situation; and whilst they fatten upon the miseries or final ruin of the flock, they are too callous to feel either remorse or pity. They follow precedents, take accustomed advantages, and keep out of the reach of human laws; and many cloak their oppression and avarice with hypocrisy, and bless God that they are rich, when their conduct proves them destitute both of piety and humanity. But the Lord leaves nations to such rulers and teachers for their sins: and it is common even for the oppressed to copy the crimes of their oppressors, till they are given up together into the hands of their neighbours and enemies, who smite and destroy them, and there is none to pity or deliver

6 In that day will I make the governors of Judah like a hearth of fire among the wood, and like a torch of fire in a sheaf; and they shall devour all the people round about; on the right hand and on the left: and Jerusalem shall be inhabited again in her own place, even in Jerusalem.

7 The Lord also shall save the tents of Judah first, that the glory of the house of David, and the glory of the inhabitants of Jerusalem do not magnify themselves against Judah.

8 In that day shall the Lord defend the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and he that is feeble among them at that day shall be as David; and the house of David shall be as God, as the Angel of the Lord before them.

9 And it shall come to pass in that day, that I will seek to destroy all the nations that come against Jerusalem.

10 And I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the Spirit of grace, and of supplications; and they shall look upon whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for him, as one mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for him, as one that is in bitterness for his first-born.

11 In that day shall there be a great mourning in Jerusalem, as the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon.

12 And the land shall mourn, every family apart; the family of the house of David apart, and their wives apart; the family of the house of Nathan apart, and their wives apart;

CHAP. XIII.

The fountain to be opened for the cleansing of Jerusalem, 1. The extirpation of idolatry and false prophets, 2—6. The sufferings of Christ, the scattering of his sheep, the destruction of unbelievers, and the saving of a remnant through severe trials, 7—9.

“have pierced.” (Joh xix. 37.) The ancestors of that generation of Jews caused Christ to be nailed to the cross, and pierced by the soldier's spear; for they employed the Romans to execute the sentence which they had denounced, exclaiming, “his blood be on us, and on our children!” And their posterity have ever since been consenting to this deed by their obstinate unbelief. But at the predicted period, they will know who this crucified Jesus was; and then they shall by faith look to him and mourn over him, as pierced and slain by them: this reflection will melt their hearts into extreme sorrow and compunction; they will repent of that national sin, and of all their personal transgressions, as men are used bitterly to lament the death of an only or a first-born son: for they will perceive that they had wickedly slain the Hope and Glory of their nation. This will be a general mourning of the whole people, like that which was occasioned by the death of Josiah, who was slain in the valley of Megiddon. (Marg. Ref.) All the people shall mourn with godly sorrow, which will not only be expressed in public, but in their families and in private; and even husbands and wives will separately, in retirement, give vent to their grief, and humble themselves before God for all their sins. And as their rulers, priests, scribes, and people, had concurred in the crucifixion of Christ; so all orders of men will concur in this repentance. The family of David the king, that of Nathan, the most eminent prophet in David's reign, that of Levi, or the priests and ministers of religion, and that of Shimei, who perhaps was some noted scribe, might be mentioned, as representing the different orders of men among them. A partial fulfilment of this took place, at and after the day of Pentecost, in the conversion of numbers of the Jews, who had just before crucified Christ; and it is descriptive of the conversion of sinners in every age. Yet there can be no reasonable doubt, but it is an intended prediction of the conversion of the Jewish nation, when they shall as one body embrace the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Some suppose Nathan the son of David to be meant; (12.) but then the royal house is twice mentioned, and the prophets are unnoticed, which in the Old Testament are generally considered as a distinct order. In the margin of the English Bible we have, Or, of Simeon. Our translators therefore thought that the Hebrew text might sometimes be corrected by the Greek version. (Ep. Nerecombe.) This reading, however, has been added since the time of the translators, and is not found in the old copies with marginal readings.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The word of the Lord, (“who stretcheth forth the heavens and layeth the foundation of the earth, and “formeth the spirit of man within him,”) will be a heavy burden on those against whom it is sent: but it is “for Israel,” and speaks peace to all true believers. Many have been the attempts of wicked men to extirpate the people of God; but they have only ruined themselves: for the Church has always proved a cup of trembling to all her assailants, and a burdensome stone to those who have burdened themselves with her; and all will assuredly be crushed or cut in pieces, who injure her, even if all the power, valour, policy, learning, wealth, and multitude of the whole earth should combine against her. Whilst the rulers and teachers of the Church expect their help and strength from the Lord of hosts their God, and use no means or instruments except such as are consecrated; his watchful eyes will ever be open to take care of them, and his arm stretched forth to protect them, and to strike their persecutors with astonishment, blindness, or madness. But it is far more desirable, when the examples, labours, and conversation of ministers and Christians render them as “an hearth of fire among the wood, or like a torch in a sheaf;” to kindle the flame of divine love and holy affection from heart to heart, and to diffuse the influence of piety to the right hand and to the left. In the conversion of sinners, as well as in redemption, the Lord will exclude boasting, and take care that “no flesh shall glory in his presence;” therefore not many mighty, noble, wealthy, or learned are called; and he often begins among the poor and despised families, towns, cities and nations; and then uses them as his instruments in the salvation of a remnant of the rich, the wise, and the honourable; that these may not have any ground of self-preference or contempt of others, or any pretence for assuming authority over them. The best of men have hitherto been so very far from perfection, that it is possible for a company of believers to be called forth, the weakest of whom shall exceed the most illustrious of those who have yet been known on earth: and we are led to conclude, that this will actually be the case, in that purer state of the Church that is predicted. Then the feeblest Christian will equal David in strength of faith and vigour of affections; yet there will be rulers, teachers, and examples of such superior attainments, as to be fully qualified to go before the people in every duty and every grace. These will be followers of God as dear children, and bear the image and possess the mind of Christ to a degree of which in these lukewarm days we have scarcely any conception. Before we can expect the peculiar protection and consolation of the Lord, we must be deeply humbled for our sins. The beginning, progress, and perfection of our sanctification come from “the pouring out of the Spirit of grace and supplications;” wherever that is granted, fervent prayer and deep humiliation will be the never-failing effects; the eyes of the mind will soon be directed in faith to him that was pierced for our sins; and whilst we condemn the conduct of him who betrayed and of those who crucified the Lord of glory, we shall not excuse ourselves. We shall remember, that in fact our sins were the cause of the Redeemer's crucifixion; our unbelief has been a continuation of the crime of his crucifiers; our ingratitude and dishonourable conduct have often tended towards the guilt of crucifying him afresh. We may therefore all look to him whom we have pierced, and upon our sins, as the thorns, the nails, and the spear. This will increase the poignancy of our sorrow and remorse; whilst we hope for mercy through that blood which we helped to shed. When our sins are viewed in this glass, we see more cause to mourn for them, than for the loss of any earthly object; and we become inconsolable, save by the consolations of the blessed Gospel. Such godly sorrow will not be ostentatious, but will court privacy, and vent itself in secret: it will cause us to disrelish the ordinary comforts and pleasures of life; and it is equally useful to all orders of men in society; "for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God." When we are thus humbled, and yet can rejoice in the grace of the Gospel, let us pray for the out-pouring of the Spirit on the Jews and beuigthed heathens; that with one consent they may look to Jesus, mourn for sin, become his disciples, and partake of his grace and salvation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1. In the day mentioned at the close of the foregoing chapter, a fountain will be opened to the rulers and people of the Jews, in which to wash away their sins. This must mean the atoning blood of Christ, connected with his sanctifying grace. It began to fill, when from his pierced side flowed both blood and water: and it is not like the laver or sea of brass, in the court of the temple, which continually had need to be replenished: for it is a fountain supplied from his infinite fulness, and the infinite sufficiency of his atonement, and never diminishing, how much soever it is used. This fountain has indeed been hitherto closed with respect to the unbelieving Jewish nation: but when the Spirit of grace shall humble and soften their hearts, he will also open it to their view, and lead them to wash away their guilt and pollution in it. (Notes 2 Cor. iii. 13-16.) 'He showeth what shall be the fruit of their repentance, to wit, remission of sins by the blood of Christ, which shall be a continual running fountain, to purge them from all uncleanness.' When Christ was crucified, the blood and water from his pierced side were emblems of pardon through his atonement, and regeneration and sanctification by his Spirit. These blessings are signified in the Lord's supper and in baptism; but to explain this promise of either or both of them, considered as external ordinances, is palpably to mistake the sign for the thing signified, than which nothing can be more perilous.

V. 2, 3. Idolatry had before the captivity been the prevailing sin of the Jewish nation; and their false prophets had been the instruments of unclean spirits, in seducing the people into that and other abominations. But they were never addicted to gross idolatry after the days of Zechariah. That thorough reformation, however, that will take place upon their conversion to Christianity, is predicted under these allusions. Idolatry and superstition have been and are very prevalent in many parts of the Christian Church: and whilst this has formed one grand hinderance to the conversion of the Jews, it has also ensnared many of them, by inducing them to idolatrous compliances, to escape persecution: but about the time here predicted all these antichristian abominations will be terminated; and the converted Jews will watch very carefully against every appearance of such abuses. The very names and memorials of all the idols will be abolished; and the false prophets, and the unclean spirit that inspired them, will be banished, (Rev. xix. xx. 1-3); and if any shall still presume to prophesy against the Gospel of Christ, or to promote idolatry or superstition, even their parents will strenuously oppose them, and be the first to bring them forth to punishment, according to the law of Moses. (Notes, Deut. xii. 6-11.) They shall treat such a one in the same manner as their fathers did the true prophet, the Messias; shall pierce or thrust him through, (Lowth.) How far the Jews may then, under a theocracy, be governed according to their judicial law, we cannot determine: but these expressions taken from it, merely denote the vigorous and decided measures that will be used to suppress these abominations, according to the nature of the dispensation under which they shall live. The universal ruin of idolatry seems also predicted. 'That gross idolatry, wherewith the world was infected, shall now cease; and the very names of those pagan idols shall now be forgotten.' (Bp. Hall.)

predicted time, as well as the failure of their predictions, will put them to shame; and they will no longer wear rough garments, like those of the true prophets, in order to deceive the people: but they will disclaim the name, for fear of disgrace and punishment: declaring, that they had been brought up to other occupations, about which they meant to employ themselves: "for man hath taught me," &c." or, "man hath possessed me." that is, as his servant. Some have thought that the abolition of the several orders of the monks and friars was here predicted; who will at length be ashamed of their distinguishing habits and pretensions to superior sanctity and miraculous powers, and will be glad to betake themselves to other employments. But perhaps it only applies to them, because they resemble the false prophets: who seem to have set for the picture which the prophet drew of future deceivers. Among those who will disavow their being prophets, some will be found "with wounds in their hands;" which may refer to marks imprinted in their hands, as a badge of their being devoted to some idol; to the wounds that men have sometimes given themselves by voluntary austerities; or to some punishment that had been inflicted on them for their impostures. These they ascribe to other causes, as having been the effect of accident, or correction, when at home with their friends. As a most remarkable prophecy of Christ follows in the next verse, some expositors explain this also of him, and the wounds that he received in his hands when crucified. The Jews were professedly the friends of the promised Messiah, and he had acted in the most friendly manner to the nation; but they put him to death by a blind and malevolent perversion of the law, enacted against deceivers and false prophets.

V. 7. The prophet here enters on a new subject: he had been prophesying of more remote futurity; but he returns to the death of Christ, and shows what the consequence of that event would be to his people. The sword of divine justice had lain asleep, as it were, during the long season of God's forbearance, but he now commanded it to awake, in order to execute vengeance upon his Shepherd, whom he had appointed to feed his flock: it was commissioned to awake against the Man, one in human nature, the Redeemer, now considered as incarnate: yet this was no ordinary man, much less an enemy, but the Fellow, the Companion, Equal, Compeer of the Lord of hosts, the Son of the Father, "the Word that was with God, and was God." It was to smite this Shepherd without sparing him; which may refer to the whole of

⁂ And I will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined, and will try them as gold is tried: * they shall call on my name, and I will hear them: I will say, * It is my people; and they shall say, The LORD is my God.

Christ's sufferings, in which men and evil spirits were no more than the executioners of that wrath of God that he suffered for our sins: yet it seems especially to relate to his agonies in the garden and his exclamation on the cross, when he endured unspeakable anguish from the immediate hand of the Father, who "was pleased to bruise him and to put him to grief;" till divine justice was fully satisfied. When the Shepherd should thus be smitten for the sins of the flock, the sheep would be scattered, as the disciples were when Christ was apprehended, (Matt. xxvi. 31, 56.) and then the Lord would "turn his hand upon the little ones;" to take care of the helpless company, that would be exposed like little children to the rage of their persecutors, when their Lord was taken from them.

V. 8, 9. In consequence of the sin of the Jews in rejecting and crucifying Christ, and in opposing his Gospel, the Romans would be employed to go through and destroy the greatest part of them, all over the land. But a remnant, a third part, would be preserved: and, after having passed through trials and afflictions, like a fiery furnace, till they were proved and refined, they would at length be converted, and be acknowledged as the people of God. This may refer to the conversion of a remnant of the Jews in the days of the apostles: but it seems also to predict, that the remnant of the nation, which should survive the havoc made of them by the Romans, after having been long preserved a distinct people, in the midst of extraordinary trials and oppressions, would at length, when "the Spirit of grace should be poured upon them," call upon the Lord in good earnest: and, being converted to Christianity, be readmitted to the privileges of his people, and taught to acknowledge him to be the Lord their God, as he is revealed to sinners in Jesus Christ.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Blessed be God, he hath prepared a fountain for the vilest and most polluted; and his Gospel invites us to wash in it and be clean. The proud and unbelieving, however, cannot discern its nature, use, or excellency. But when the heart is humbled and set against sin, the fountain is disclosed to view; and the believer daily washes in it, till his robes are made white, and he is prepared to join the glorious company before the throne of God. (Marg. Ref.) Pardon of sin is inseparably connected with genuine repentance; so that justifying faith never fails to sanctify. Thus men learn to love the truths, precepts, and ordinances of their Master's use and ready for every good work. But if the sharpest sufferings lead us to call upon the Lord with increasing fervency, he will hear us; and if we be his people, and he be our God, the event of our trials will be "praise, and honour, and glory, at the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ."

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1-3. 'The Romans, being lords of the known world, had the strength of all nations united in their forces.' (Lowth's) Half. 'The Hebrew word may be rendered a portion.' 'The Romans spared the young and useful part of the Jews. However, these were either condemned to the mines in Egypt, or exposed to the sword and to the wild beasts in the provincial theatres, or sold for slaves. The forty thousand, who were permitted to go where they pleased, were Idumeans.' (Bp. Newscombe.) All these were "cut off from the city."—Some expositors, on this and other grounds, suppose that all the predictions of this chapter relate to events yet future; but probably they begin with the catastrophe of Jerusalem's destruction by the Romans, and so gradually extend to those events that shall hereafter take place in respect of the Jews, the Church of Christ, and their enemies. The time when the Romans marched their armies, composed of many nations, to besiege Jerusalem, was the day of the Lord Jesus, on which he came to "destroy" those that would not have him to reign over them." When the Romans had taken the city, all the outrages were committed, and the miseries endured, which are here predicted. A large proportion of the inhabitants were destroyed, or taken captives, and sold for slaves, &c. and multitudes were driven away, to be pursued by various perils and miseries; numbers, having been converted to Christianity, became citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem, and thus were "not cut off from the city of God." But it is probable that the remnant of Jews, who survived this almost exterminating destruction, and their descendants, who have for so many centuries been preserved a distinct people, in order to their future restoration, are intended. (Note, xiii. 2, 9.) It is also observable, that the Romans, after having been thus made the executioners of divine vengeance on the Jewish nation, never prospered as they had done before: but the Lord evidently fought against them, and all the nations which composed their overgrown empire; till at last it was subverted, and their

xvi. 14

God, and to hate every false way. They forget, or abhor, their idols and iniquities; they become zealous against all impostures, by which false teachers and unclean spirits corrupt the minds of men; they therefore know no men after the flesh: Christ becomes more dear to them than sons or daughters; they will "contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints;" nor will they connive at their nearest relatives, who speak lies in the name of the Lord. Indeed the Christian dispensation doth not require those severities which God commanded by the Mosaic law: yet the prevalence of true religion will bring all delusions into neglect, and expose them to censure; and it will make men ashamed and afraid to publish their false visions, or impostures, by which they lie in wait to deceive. Even external mortification and apparent deadness to the world may be the cloak of ambition and hypocrisy; and rough garments may be used, as well as more pompous sacerdotal vestments, to awe men's minds into a blind deference to an antichristian deceiver: and it is desirable that false teachers should be driven from that employment to some more useful occupation; but still more that they should "repent and do works meet for repentance." It can never be amiss for us to recollect the wounds in the hands and feet of the gracious Saviour. Alas, how often hath he been wounded in the house of his professed friends! Yea, by his real friends, his disciples, when, forgetful of their obligations, they have acted inconsistently with the honour of his Gospel! May we then ever remember the price which it cost him to open for us a fountain for sin and uncleanness: may we not forget the dignity of our Shepherd, as the Companion of the Lord of hosts; nor yet the depth of his humiliation and the intensity of his sufferings, whilst smitten by the sword of justice, when it awaked against him, that he might be punished for our sins. Thus, whilst we wash in the sacred fountain, we shall reflect with awe and gratitude on him, whose vital blood supplied the purifying stream: we shall learn to hate sin and love our Benefactor; to submit to corrections and endure persecutions; expecting to be conformed to the Redeemer by suffering in this evil world, as we hope to be in glory when we arrive at that better world above. For whilst the many neglect this great salvation to their ruin, the remnant that are saved must pass "through much tribulation into the kingdom of God;" that by these fiery trials, (as well as by the purifying fountain,) they may be refined like gold, and made meet for

4 ¶ And his feet shall stand in that day upon the mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east, and the mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst thereof toward the east and toward the west, and there shall be a very great valley; and half of the mountain shall remove toward the north, and half of it toward the south.

5 And ye shall flee to the valley of the mountains; for the valley of the mountains shall reach unto Azal: yea, ye shall flee, like as ye fled from before the earthquake in the days of Uzziah king of Judah: and the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with thee.

6 And it shall come to pass in that day, that the light shall not be clear, nor dark:

7 But it shall be one day which shall be known to the Lord, not day, nor night: but it shall come to pass, that at evening time it shall be light.

8 And it shall be in that day, that living waters shall go out from Jerusalem; half of them toward the hinder sea: in summer and in winter shall it be.

9 And the Lord shall be King over all the earth: in that day shall there be one Lord, and his name one.

Day of battle. When God overthrew the Egyptians in the Red Sea; or when the ark of his presence led the armies of Israel in the land of Canaan. (Louth.)

V. 4, 5. The Lord Jesus, who will go forth to fight against the enemies of his people, often stood upon the mount of Olives when on earth; from thence he ascended into heaven; and in consequence of his ascension, and the commission granted to his apostles, the Gospel was sent to the different regions of the globe. The ceremonial law, and the whole Mosaic dispensation, which obstructed the admission of the Gentiles into the Church, as the surrounding mountains did their entrance into Jerusalem, was removed. The peculiar privileges that Jerusalem had enjoyed, (of which the pleasant and fruitful mount of Olives was an apt emblem,) were taken from her, and divided among the nations on every side: and those Jews who believed the word of God, fled away from the destruction that was coming on Jerusalem. The valley caused by the removal of this mountain reached unto Azal. Some suppose this to be a proper name of some place near the mount of Olives, but, being derived from a verb which signifies to separate, it may signify the separate place. Some think that the Gentiles are meant, who by the ceremonial law had been separated from the people of God, but were at length admitted into the Church: but perhaps the place to which the Jewish converts fled, to separate themselves from their unbelieving countrymen, when the Roman armies were about to encompass Jerusalem, may be intended. Thither they fled, being warned by these convulsions. On the cleaving of mount Olive, while part was removed to the north and part to the south, a valley, or chasin, is supposed to have been made from east to west, through which they who took the alarm hastened to escape, as the Jews had fled from the earthquake in the days of Uzziah. This seems to have been very terrible, as the traditional memory of it was so common when Zechariah prophesied nearly three hundred years after. Then "the Lord God would come, and all the saints with "him:" that is, Christ would come to destroy Jerusalem and to establish the Gospel-Church, in which all his saints and angels would joyfully concur. The above seems the most satisfactory interpretation: the language made use of may, with great probability, be considered as figurative; and the rejection of the Jews and establishment of the Christian Church, chiefly of Gentile converts, with only a remnant of God's ancient people, and the total abolition of all the ancient rites, was the most extraordinary religious revolution that had then, or has yet, taken place. Some, however, consider the passage as a prediction of events yet unfulfilled; but, as might have been expected, they are not agreed what particular events are intended.

V. 6-9. If we have properly explained the preceding verses, these contain a compendious prophecy of the state of the Church, from its establishment in the apostle's days, to those glorious times that are expected. In that day, under the Christian dispensation, for a long season, the light would neither be clear nor dark: it would be greatly obscured by ignorance, heresy, superstition, and idolatry; yet not wholly extinguished: and the state of the Church would be much deformed by sin and calamities; yet some holiness and consolation would be found. This period could neither be called a clear bright day, cheered and illumined by the shining of a summer's sun: nor would it be dark, as if the sun were set or totally eclipsed: but it would contain a great mixture of truth and error, of holiness and sin, of happiness and misery. Yet it would form one day, and never be interrupted by a night of total darkness. It would also be known unto the Lord, as to the degree of its light and the term of its continuance; and he would watch over, and take care of, his cause and people all the time of it. But his people would hardly know whether to call it day or night, or a compound of both: yet at length, towards the evening of the world, the Sun of righteousness would break forth, and shine with unclouded splendour, dispelling the gloom of ignorance, heresy, idolatry, and superstition; and illuminating the Church and the earth with knowledge, righteousness, peace, and consolation. During that whole period, however, the Gospell made in the condition, disposition, and character of the Jews, as great as if a large district should be entirely levelled to a plain; the mountains being cast down, and the valleys filled up. Every outward or inward obstruction to their conversion, and restoration to their own land, will be effectually removed. Jerusalem, that hath long been trodden under foot of the Gentiles, will be raised up from that debased condition, and rebuilt to the whole of her former extent, and inhabited throughout; and it shall no more be devoted to utter destruction, under the awful curse of God, as it had been after the crucifixion of Christ; but it will become a secure and peaceful habitation for the converted Jews. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12-15. These verses seem to predict the tremendous judgments, that will be inflicted on those who shall oppose the settlement of the Jews in their own land: but whether they are to be understood literally, or not, the event must determine. (Notes, Ez. xxxviii. xxxix.) They will all, however, be subdued by the Jews fighting at Jerusalem, and by their fierce contentions with each other; and all that appertain to them will share in the plague: whilst the Jews whom they assailed, will be enriched by their spoil. But it may also be interpreted of the destruction of all antichristian powers, which shall precede the glorious millennium. (Notes, Rev. xix.) The Lord will save the tents of Judah first; and then they shall join their forces against the common enemy, when he comes against Jerusalem. (xii. 2.) (Isa. lvi.) No doubt the same events are predicted as in the verses referred to.

attended by the influences of the Holy Spirit, having begun its progress from Jerusalem, would continue its course on every side, amidst all those changes of which summer and winter are an emblem; so that nothing should totally impede its progress, till the Lord should become " King over all the earth," not only in right, but in fact, (Notes, &c. Ez. xlviii.) till neither idols, false religion, nor antichristian powers, were left to be his rivals; till all princes should submit to and serve him; and all the earth should agree in one object and way of worship, and unite in submission and obedience to one Lord. No longer would they have deities of different names, according to the regions they inhabited; or trust to the tutelary care of this or the other saint; or be divided into a number of sects and parties: but they would be all of one mind, to worship that one " name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost," into which all Christians are baptized.— This interpretation evidently accords with various other prophecies, both in the Old and New Testament, (Marg. Ref.) and with the history of the Christian Church, which records the fulfilment of those prophecies: and it shows that the prophet was inspired to deliver a regular series of predictions, from the death of Christ, (xiii. 7.) to the establishment of the millennium. Whereas, according to some eminent expositors, the most distant events are brought together, without the least connexion; and the reader cannot tell whether any part has been fulfilled, and what; or whether the triumphs of the Church on earth, or the glories of heaven, are foretold.

V. 16—19. The feast of tabernacles was typical of Christ's dwelling in our nature as in a tabernacle; and of the Christian's contempt of the world, and joy in the Lord, as a stranger and pilgrim on earth. To keep the feast of tabernacles therefore seems to mean, that the persons intended would be converted to Christ, and join with pleasure in his ordinances, continually and with perseverance. The remnant of the nations, that had just before been fighting against Jerusalem, or the Church; the subjects of the eastern and western antichrists, and the Gentiles, will in great numbers be converted to pure Christianity, and become the spiritual worshippers and obedient servants of the Lord. But such as persist in idolatry and opposition to true religion, will be visited with drought and famine; which probably implies both temporal and spiritual judgments. And, as Egypt seldom has any rain, and another method must be taken to visit her with famine; so no situation or circumstances shall preserve any people from these judgments, who refuse to worship the Lord alone, because of their attachment to old superstitions and idolatries; they must therefore either be converted or destroyed. The Jews have a tradition, that the defeat of Gog and Magog, which seems to be the same discomfiture which is here described, shall fall out on the feast of tabernacles; or, as others say, the seven months' cleansing of the land shall be finished at that time. (Isa. 64.) In the upper parts of Egypt they seldom have any rain; but near the Mediterranean sea it sometimes rains plentifully, which is considered as a detriment, and not an advantage.

V. 20, 21. God's name shall be honoured in every circumstance. (Bp. Newcombe.) At length the time of the complete peace and purity of the Church will arrive. Then the very bells upon the horses, or their bridles, will be inscribed with HOLINESS TO THE LORD, according to the inscription on the mitre of the high-priest. Some explain this of the war-horses; supposing it to mean, that these being disused, their ornaments will be consecrated to God. Others understand it of horses employed in common services; and suppose it to imply, that the most secular occupations will then be so conducted, that they will become holy actions performed to the glory of God. Then the pots, (either the earthen or brazen pots that were used in boiling the sacrifices, or the drinking cups of the priests,) will be as holy as the bowls before the altar had been; which may signify, that the meanest minister or Christian, (who is a spiritual priest,) will be equal to what the most eminent of God's servants formerly were; or that all their pleasures will be regulated with such moderation, and united with so much piety and gratitude, as to render them acceptable, even like solemn religious services. And this will be the case with all the pots in Jerusalem: all persons will then be thus devoted to God in their employments and satisfactions. They are likewise represented as using these pots even for sacrifices; which may mean, that the ceremonial distinction between holy and unholy will be abolished; and that men will conduct their ordinary affairs and their sacred services upon the same holy principles of faith, fear, love, and obedience. And in that day, there will be no more any Canaanite in the house of the Lord: which may mean, that mercenary ministers will no more be allowed to prostitute that sacred function; nor ungodly men to abuse holy ordinances to promote their worldly ends. For the word may be rendered a merchant; and Christ will then drive all buyers and sellers out of the temple. This happy state will continue till the end of the world. How exactly do all the prophets agree about the final event of the long continued contest betwixt the worship of the true God, and idolatry; betwixt piety, and impiety; truth, and error; holiness, and unholiness! "At the even tide it shall be "light;" and blessed be God, that season cannot be very distant.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

The judgments of God commonly begin at the sanctuary. When his day of retribution comes, he can soon gather the nations together to battle against the objects of his wrath: and he needs only give them power, and their own wicked hearts will dispose them to all the enormities, which avarice, cruelty, revenge, or lust, can perpetrate. But the residue of his chosen people shall never "be cut off from the city of our God;" and he seldom permits those to prosper who have imbrued their hands in the blood of his worshippers. The Lord of glory, by his work on earth, in our nature, and by his ascension into heaven, hath removed all obstructions to our entrance into his Church, or into the mansions of felicity; and by his Gospel he hath, as it were, sent Jerusalem's choicest privileges to these distant regions: yet, except we "flee" for refuge to lay hold on this hope set before us," we shall be no better for these advantages in that day when he shall come to judgment, and all his saints with him. Men flee without delay from an earthquake, and leave every thing behind them, "lest the earth swallow them up;" also;" how should we then flee to the greatest distance from the brink of that tremendous gulph, which continually swallows up such multitudes of the ungodly! In this world the believer enjoys the light of day; yet it is attended with so many clouds and storms, that it often

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

The judgments of God commonly begin at the sanctuary. When his day of retribution comes, he can soon gather the nations together to battle against the objects of his wrath: and he needs only give them power, and their own wicked hearts will dispose them to all the enormities, which avarice, cruelty, revenge, or lust, can perpetrate. But the residue of his chosen people shall never "be cut off from the city of our God;" and he seldom permits those to prosper who have imbrued their hands in the blood of his worshippers. The Lord of glory, by his work on earth, in our nature, and by his ascension into heaven, hath removed all obstructions to our entrance into his Church, or into the mansions of felicity; and by his Gospel he hath, as it were, sent Jerusalem's choicest privileges to these distant regions: yet, except we "flee" for refuge to lay hold on this hope set before us," we shall be no better for these advantages in that day when he shall come to judgment, and all his saints with him. Men flee without delay from an earthquake, and leave every thing behind them, "lest the earth swallow them up;" also;" how should we then flee to the greatest distance from the brink of that tremendous gulph, which continually swallows up such multitudes of the ungodly! In this world the believer enjoys the light of day; yet it is attended with so many clouds and storms, that it often seems to resemble the night. He sees, but it is "through a glass darkly;" he experiences some hope and consolation; but they are interrupted with a variety of fears, sorrows, and temptations: and his feeble beginnings of holiness are greatly counteracted and obscured by the remains and prevalence of his sinful passions. His life is therefore a strange mixture or interchange of light and darkness, and he often can scarcely tell whether it be day or night with him: yet is it one day that is known to the Lord: his faith and hope may be much enfeebled and clouded; but they are never extinguished: his Sun may be eclipsed, or hidden, but it never goes down: it may be winter with his soul, but it is never total darkness, as with those who are yet unconverted. The Lord also knows all his difficulties, discouragements, and temptations: he can distinguish between his conflicts, failures, errors, and seasons of distrust or slackness, and the total unbelief, the willing slavery and negligence of the children of disobedience: and he knows how to make all needful allowances, and to communicate proportionable supports. It often happens, likewise, that towards the evening of life the believer's light becomes more clear and abiding, and his last days his best days: and indeed his personal experience generally accords to that of the Church, whose "light will shine more and more unto the perfect day." Let us then be thankful even for the dawning of "the Sun of righteousness" upon our souls; and let us rejoice in the hope of a clearer and more sanctifying and cheering light, towards the close of our pilgrimage; as ushering in the perfect light of the world above. The sacred streams of living waters also, that flowed from Zion, have reached our land; may we continually refresh our souls with them, amidst the varying dispensations of Providence: and may every revolution and every distress of nations make way for them to flow on, wider and deeper, till the Lord Jesus be acknowledged King over all the earth; and till all men in sincerity and peace unite in the spiritual worship and service of our God and Saviour; and all distinctions are swallowed up in the universal harmony of the nations, by the obedience of faith. When the Lord shall begin to work in answer to our prayers, every mountain shall be brought low, and every valley shall be exalted; proud Babylon shall fall, and the ruins of Jerusalem shall be repaired, and her borders enlarged, that men may dwell therein safely, and fear no curse or utter destruction for ever.

V. 12—21.

Whilst the grand revolutions predicted in this chapter shall be taking place, (and indeed at all times,) tremendous will be the plagues of all who fight against the Church: and could we see the present condition of those who have perished in this conflict, we should behold more terrible things, than if we witnessed men's "flesh consuming as they stand upon their feet, their eyes consuming in their holes, or their tongues in their mouths;" and every member of the body, that had been an instrument of unrighteousness, enduring the awful vengeance of God. Even that furious rage and malice which cause men here to plague, torment, and murder each other, are faint shadows of the perfect mutual enmity that reigns universally among the whole multitude of those that have perished in their sins. But every judgment of God on his enemies will tend to enrich and profit his believing people: his all-powerful grace speedily converts, and his pious mercy pardons and reconciles, even those who have just before been fighting against him; and they learn to rejoice in his worship and service. But how distinguishing is that grace which thus saves some of his enemies, at the moment when he consigns others to destruction! Yet no unbelievers can escape, how long soever they be borne with: every sinner must either be reconciled to God, or fall before him; for "his hand will find out all his enemies, and he will make them as a fiery oven in the day of his wrath;" nor can any man evade his vengeance, who doth not come to him, worship him, and rejoice before him. The more the Church is weaned from the beggarly elements of external distinctions and relative sanctity, the more will she be replenished with real holiness. Every action and every enjoyment of the believer ought to be so regulated according to the truth and will of God, and directed to his glory, that it may be holiness to him. Our whole lives ought to be as one constant sacrifice or act of devotion: no selfish or mercenary motive should prevail in any of our actions, any more than a Canaanite should enter into the house of the Lord. Alas, how far are we from this perfection! How far is the Christian Church from this state of purity! How are her sacred functions made subservient to the avarice, ambition, and lusts of men! How are her ordinances profaned to secular and mercenary purposes! How are our lives defiled by low and selfish pursuits, and our duties tainted by wrong motives! But times of greater purity are at hand, and the Lord will come speedily to reform and enlarge his Church, as he hath promised. Yet in heaven alone will perfect knowledge, holiness, and felicity be found.

BOOK OF MALACHI.

The name of this prophet signifies, My angel, or My messenger; and is the same word that he used concerning the forerunner of Christ, and nearly the same that he used about Christ himself, (iii. 1.)— Perhaps he was called Malachi with reference to these predictions, as well as to his prophetic office; and probably he had another name. He seems to have been the last in order of the prophets whose writings were transmitted to posterity; and to have been contemporary with Nehemiah, or to have lived after his time. The scope of his prophecy was to reprove and reform many abuses and enormities, that prevailed among the Jews, and especially the priests; to announce the near approach of the Messiah; to declare the effects of his coming to men of different characters, and to teach the people in what manner they ought to wait and prepare for that event. But it also contains predictions of the calling of the Gentiles and the extensive propagation of the Gospel. Probably with Malachi the prophetic office ceased, or was suspended till the coming of the Messiah, which was about four hundred years. As this prophet particularly foretold the ministry of John Baptist and the speedy coming of Christ, he is very frequently quoted or referred to, in the New Testament. (Com. iii. 1. with Matt. xi. 10. Mark i. 2. Luke vii. 27.—and iv. 5, 6. with Matt. xvii. 10—12. Mark ix. 11, 12. Luke i. 16, 17.)

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 2—5. (Marg. Ref.) The prophet was directed to open his message of sharp rebukes, by reminding the people of the Lord's peculiar love to them, as it had been manifested in all his dealings with the nation. Yet he knew, that they would inquire where he had loved them? They had endured grievous hardships during the Babylonish captivity; and, though now restored to their own land, they still continued subject to the kings of Persia; so that they could not discern any special fruits of such peculiar love to them. Perhaps they supposed, that they were entitled to the divine favour, as the descendants of Abraham, the friend of God, and from Isaac the promised seed. But Esau likewise was descended from Abraham and Isaac; and was twin-brother to Jacob, and elder than he; yet the Lord had loved and chosen Jacob, and rejected Esau as the object of his aversion. Esau indeed prospered in the world ; but he lost the birth-right and the blessing, and lived and died, as far as it is known, profane and unbelieving : whilst Jacob was made the heir of the promises ; walked with God as a believer, and died happy. They knew the history of Jacob's posterity, and they could not deny that the Lord had always remarkably appeared for them : but the mountains of the heritage, allotted to Esau's descendants, had, by wars and various means, been rendered so waste and barren, that they were only fit to harbour those monstrous serpents that frequent sandy deserts. The impoverished Edomites indeed were projecting to return to their land and rebuild their cities, as the Jews had done : but the Lord purposed to defeat their efforts, and to make it appear that his indignation against them was perpetual, because of their other sins, and because they had unjustly enlarged their borders, by seizing the lands allotted to Israel. Thus the Jews would see, and be compelled to own that the Lord had magnified himself in maintaining their lot, and punishing those who endeavoured to trench upon them. Edom was the type of the enemies of God, as Israel was of his chosen people. Judas Maccabeus and other Jewish leaders shortly after entirely subdued the Edomites.

From, &c. Or, " Beyond the border of Israel." " God ° showeth his great power in other countries besides Israel." (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 6-8. It was allowed by all, that a son ought to honour the person, and respect the reputation and authority, of his father. A servant also was used to fear the displeasure, and reverence the will and commands, of his master ; and men would condemn him that neglected the duty of this relation. But God had always been as a Father to Israel, not only as the Author and Preserver of their natural lives, or their Benefactor in temporal things ; but in respect of their religious advantages and the typical adoption that belonged to them : yet where were the honour, reverence, submission, and regard to his will and glory, which that relation required ? They also called him their Lord and Master : but they neither aimed to please, nor feared to offend him ; they neither respected his authority nor obeyed his commands. This was especially the case with the priests, who were more highly privileged than the people, and more expressly consecrated to his service : yet they had despised his name. They would indeed inquire wherein they had despised his name ? as disclaiming the charge, and offended with the messenger that brought it. But in answer to this, they were accused of offering polluted bread on his altar. This may refer either to the meat-offerings which were burned upon the altar, and which they made of the refuse of the wheat ; or to the sacrifices that fed the sacred flame, and were the bread or food of the altar. If they further inquired how this polluted the Lord ? It was answered, that they had said, " The table of the Lord is contemptible." They thought that any thing was good enough to be consumed upon the altar, or to supply, as it were, the table of the Lord : so that, provided the people did but bring the best of their increase to their tables, they let them offer the refuse of their flocks and herds in sacrifice. Thus the blind, the lame, and the sick, that were good for nothing else, were consumed on God's altar, from contempt of him, and expressly contrary to his law ; and was not this evidently evil ? Would their civil governors be satisfied with such worthless animals for tribute or for presents ? Nay, would they not think themselves grossly affronted, if any thing vile and refuse were offered them ? And could they expect that the God of heaven would accept either them or their services, seeing they so despised him ? — It is evident that these priests understood nothing of the typical meaning of the sacrifices, as shadowing forth the unblemished Lamb of God ; that they were equally ignorant of the law, which required that the Lord should be served with the first and best of every thing : and that they grudged the expense, thinking all those oblations thrown away that did not turn to their own emolument,

V. 9—11. The Jews seem to have been at this time under divine rebukes; and the priests were appointed to burn incense and make intercession for the people in behalf of the nation. Let them, therefore, beseech the Lord to be gracious to Israel, according to the duty of their office: but as these judgments came upon the nation for their sins, or those into which they led the people, could they expect that God would regard their persons, or answer their prayers? For they had no love to the Lord or his service, but merely to the emoluments of the sacerdotal office: so that none of them would open the doors of the temple, or keep up the fire on the altar, or do any thing that they could help, except some extra emolument were annexed to it. God had provided sufficiently for their maintenance; but their love of filthy lucre was insatiable, and he had no pleasure in such mercenary services. He would, therefore, soon terminate that dispensation, and the priesthood which they so profaned, and deprive the nation of their idolized and abused privileges: but he would cause his name to be adored among the Gentiles all over the earth; and in every place their spiritual worship should ascend as incense and a pure offering into his presence, through the intercession of the great High Priest whom he had appointed. So that whilst the Jews, especially the priests, had despised, and would more despise, his name, it should be rendered great and honoured among the heathen, in all parts of the earth. (Marg. Ref.) "Surely the doors shall be closed against you, neither shall ye kindle the fire of my altar in vain." (16.) (Ep. Newcombe.) Thus the verse may be considered as a prophecy of the abolition of the Levitical priesthood; and an introduction to a prediction concerning the conversion of the nations, and the spiritual priesthood, in the subsequent verse. But then the text must be altered on slender authority, and without necessity; for our version gives an important and instructive view of the subject. "We have here a prophecy of the conversion of the Gentiles; and, as usual, under Jewish images." (Ep. Newcombe.)

V. 12—14. None of the Jews so much profaned the great name of the Lord as the priests did, who ought to have most hallowed it. They treated his sacrifices and oblations as polluted, and all the gains that regularly accrued from his service contemptible. Perhaps they thought any thing was good enough to set upon the table of shew-bread; and scorned to eat that which was removed from it, as if it had been polluted: they complained and showed by their very looks, that the services to which they were continually called were intolerably wearisome, and they snuffed with contempt at the portion of the sacrifices allotted to them by the law. They therefore allowed the people to bring blemished sacrifices; who, being also weary of these expensive institutions, readily brought such as God could not consistently accept at their hands. Indeed, if any were in reality so poor, that they could not procure the appointed sacrifices for the payment of their vows, they might be borne with: but that man would surely incur the awful curse of God, who attempted to impose on him by vain pretences, when he had a proper sacrifice, and yet paid his vow with one that was corrupt and worthless.— Even the heathens had heard so much of the power and majesty of Israel's King, that they trembled at his name, and could Israelites expect to despise it with impunity?— Animals, which must not be sacrificed in payment of a vow, might be presented as a free-will offering. (Note. Lev. xxii. 13—25.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
 V. 1—5.

Every difference that subsists betwixt one man and another, in outward circumstances, religious advantages, or the state of his soul, originates from the free love of God; who alone maketh one to differ from another, whatever instruments or means are employed for that purpose.— All the evil that sinners feel or fear, is the just recompense of their crimes; but all their hopes and comforts flow from the Lord's unmerited mercy. He did not choose his people because they had done good; but that they might be holy: nor did he pass others by, because they were worse by nature, or because he foresaw they would be worse; but for reasons best known to himself, and because every one of our fallen race is a vessel of wrath in himself fitted to destruction. If then "we love him, it is because he first loved us." We all are too prone to undervalue God's mercies, and to palliate our own offences: yet if men habitually derogate from the value of the favours shown them, and excuse their inconsistent and ungrateful conduct, they give clear evidence that they want humility, faith, or love. In vain do ungodly men expect to remedy their own misfortunes, when the anger of the Lord lays their heritages waste; they may build and plant, but he will throw down and root up; if they persist in their wickedness, they will be called a people against whom he hath indignation for ever; and when the redeemed shall witness the final destruction of the wicked, they will see and acknowledge the glory of God, as displayed in their punishment, as well as in their own most free salvation.

CHAP. II.

4 And ¹ ye shall know that I have sent this commandment unto you, ² that my covenant might be with Levi, saith the LORD of hosts.

5 My ¹ covenant was with him of life and peace; and ^m I gave them to him for the fear wherewith he feared me, and was afraid before my name.

6 The ^o law of truth was in his mouth, and iniquity was not found in his lips: ^o he walked with me in peace and equity, ^p and did turn many away from iniquity.

8 But ^o ye are departed out of the way: ^o ye have caused many to ^{*} stumble at the law: ^o ye have corrupted the covenant of Levi, saith the LORD of hosts.

9 Therefore have I also ^o made you contemptible and base ^r before all the people, according as ye have not kept my ways, ² but [†] have been partial in the law.

10 ¶ Have we not ^a all one father? ^b hath not one God created us? ^c why do we deal treacherously every man against his brother, ^d by profaning the covenant of our fathers?

11 Judah hath dealt treacherously, ^o and an abomination is committed in Israel and in Jerusalem; for Judah hath [†] profaned the holiness of the LORD, which [‡] he loved, [‡] and hath married the daughter of a strange god.

12 The LORD will ^b cut off the man that doeth this, [‡] the ¹ master and the scholar, [‡] out of the tabernacles of Jacob, [‡] and him that offereth an offering unto the LORD of hosts.

13 Therefore have I also ^o made you

Say, he had in a measure done this already. But he meant to corrupt their seed-corn, that it should yield no crop; he would not prosper any of their labours: or he would render their posterity and the priestly family contemptible, and bring it to decay: yea, he would render them vile; as if the dung that was taken from the entrails of the sacrifices should be spread over their faces, and they covered over, and taken away to the dung-hill along with it, as refuse and loathsome. 'The maw was the priests, (Deut. xviii. 3:)' but such priests deserved only the dung which it contained.' (Bp. Newcombe.)

V. 4-9. The Lord made a covenant with the tribe of Levi and the family of Aaron about the priesthood, as well as one with the nation of Israel about the land of Canaan, &c.; and afterwards one with David about the Kingdom. And the Levites would know at length that God had sent these orders, that this covenant might be confirmed to them, by means of their repentance and reformation. The whole tribe of Levi and family of Aaron was here spoken of as a single person, with whom the covenant of life and peace had been made: which would be enjoyed in the favour of God and the comfort of his service. This appointment was a gracious recompense of their piety and reverential fear of God: for when this trust was committed to them, many of them were well acquainted with the law given by Moses, and ready to speak of it to the people; their worship and conversation were sincere and faithful, and free from iniquity or hypocrisy: they walked before God, as at peace with him, and as following after equity and peace with men; and they were instrumental in converting numbers from their sins to the worship and service of God. They were not mere sacrificers as their posterity had become: but they were sensible that the priest ought to be ready to speak upon any part of sacred knowledge, and as the messenger of God, to instruct the people from his word. But their posterity had departed from this good way; they had violated the law by their conduct, and perverted it by their explications; and thus they stumbled, prejudiced, and misled the people: they had abused, and broken the covenant made with their fathers; and therefore they were rendered vile among the people, and exposed to contempt, as a worthless mercenary set of men. This was a divine judgment upon them for their sins; especially for being partial in the law, and leaving out such parts as did not suit their interest, convenience, or inclination, or interpreting it by private regards and affections.

Fear wherewith, &c. 'As the zeal of the Levites against the worshippers of the golden calf, and that zealous act of Phinehas, mentioned Num. xxv. The Levites had forty-eight cities allotted them among the several tribes, that the people might more easily consult them.' (Lenth.) 'It is required of the priests of God's sanctuary, that they should be men of knowledge and heavenly wisdom; so as their breasts should keep, and their lips should express to the people, the right understanding of divine things.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 10-12. The prophet next addressed himself to both the priests and the people. They were all descended from Adam and Noah, as men; and from Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as Israelites. They were formed by the Creator, of one nature and of one nation; yet they dealt treacherously with each other: and this they did in many respects, so as to profane that holiness, which God had put upon understood in ancient times. "For I hate him that putteth away." (Bp. Newcombe.) The Jews indeed endeavoured to cover this oppression with frivolous pretences; as one who by costly oblations attempted to cloak, or atone for, his unrepented crimes: or as if a man should cast a garment over the body of one whom he had violently slain, or the plunder that he had taken; but the Lord would not be thus imposed on. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17. The profane language of the people was as offensive to the Lord, as their impieties and injustice; for they pretended that he was most pleased with bad men. They did not prosper in their outward circumstances, as they expected; they proudly thought themselves good, and entitled to God's favour; they envied the prosperity of the wicked; and they argued, that if the Lord were a God of judgment, he would not let matters go on in this manner: so that unless he punished their enemies and prospered them, they should be ready to deny his Being, providence, or perfections. (Marg. Ref.) "The prosperity of the wicked implied, as they thought, either that their works were pleasing to God; or else that he disregarded human affairs, and would never call men to account for their actions." (Lenth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

They who will not lay the commandments of God to heart, to glorify him by repentance and obedience, must be exposed to his curse; and their abused temporal blessings will be mingled with bitterness, and be made an occasion of falling to them: and often men are under severe rebukes in their persons, connexions, undertakings, and possessions, and yet do not see the hand of God lifted up against them. It is a peculiar favour to be employed in the sacred ministry, and in making known to sinners the covenant of life and peace, when they who are thus engaged are themselves interested in that covenant, and when the Lord hath put his fear into their hearts, and made them eminent for faith and holiness. Such ministers will be able and ready to teach the truths and precepts of God's word with gravity and sincerity; and iniquity will not be found in their lips: they will walk with God in peace and righteousness, and turn many from iniquity, who will be their joy and crown of rejoicing in the day of Jesus Christ. But all, who sustain or desire to enter into this sacred function, must remember that the lips of a minister should be fraught with divine knowledge, brought forth from the good treasure of heavenly wisdom, stored up in the heart: that men may be induced to inquire the truth and will of God from his mouth, as the messenger of the Lord to their souls. Ministers who answer this description honour God, and he will honour them, and make them honourable before men in due time and measure. Alas, how many of those, who fill the holy office, entirely depart from this good old way! How many pervert and corrupt the precept of the law and the doctrine of the covenant, by their partial, superficial, and erroneous instructions; and cause men to stumble by their wicked examples! Such ministers therefore soon fall into contempt: the people disregard their instructions, and do not scruple to defraud them of their incomes; and sometimes even alienate that provision, which they have done so little to deserve, and so much to forfeit: and, however unjust man may be in these transactions, the Lord is evidently righteous, for "they that despise him shall be lightly esteemed."

V. 10—17.

The selfishness and depravity of the human heart are continually striking out new channels of iniquity. Forgetful that one God hath created them, and that they are sprung from one common father, men multiply frauds and oppressions against their brethren; nay, professed Christians against their fellow Christians, profaning that sacred character to the vilest of purposes. Among other evidences of men's comparative disregard to piety, that is peculiarly worthy of notice, which arises from the marriages of professors of godliness with those who are openly irreligious. Men, who value their distinctions of rank or family, will not degrade themselves by alliances with those beneath them: yet they who profess themselves to be of Israel, and "holiness to the Lord," set so little value on this distinction, as to ally themselves with the children of his avowed enemy! This is no light matter: for he who of old determined to "cut off from the tabernacles of Jacob, the master or scholar" who did this, will never connive at it in Christians. The Lord also notices men's behaviour in the different relations of life: he witnesses the unfaithfulness, imperiousness, and unkindness of numbers to their wives, and their violation of the vow and covenant, which they made to them before him and the congregation. He hears the prayers and complaints, and sees the tears, of those who have been thus injured; and, as he would have his children joyful in his service, he will call those to account who cause them to weep before him. The depravity of men hath rendered it necessary in civil society, to connive at deviations from the original institution of marriage: but in all our reasonings on that subject, we must revert to it. Did not he, who had "the residue of the Spirit," create one woman, and no more, for man in paradise? and was not this designed, that with united attention both parents might bring up their posterity in the fear and service of God? Can therefore polygamy or divorce

the LORD an offering in righteousness. 4 Then shall the offering of Judah and Jerusalem be pleasant unto the LORD, as in the days of old, and as in former years.

5 And I will come near to you to judgment; and I will be a swift witness against the sorcerers, and against the adulterers, and against false swearers, and against those that oppress the hireling in his wages, the widow, and the fatherless, and that turn aside the stranger from his right, and fear not, saith the LORD of hosts.

on frivolous pretences, be reconcilable with his appointment? And doth not the imperious and unfaithful conduct of many professed Christians, to the wives of their youth, form a perfect contrast to the love of Christ to his espoused Church? If men would take heed to their spirits, they would find, that their behaviour in relative life springs from base selfishness, which disregards the welfare of society and the happiness of individuals, when put in competition with the indulgence of their vile passions and unreasonable caprices, however they may cloak their violence by other pretences. Yet we may the less wonder at their cruelty to their inferiors, when they weary God himself with their impiety and infidelity; and when they take occasion from his righteous rebukes to blaspheme his name, and charge him with partiality and injustice! But they who inquire in this daring manner, "Where is the God of judgment?" will soon be answered, by his appearing to judge the world in righteousness, and to inflict vengeance on all his enemies.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1-4. It is evident that the Lord himself here speaks; and he promises that he will send his messenger to prepare the way before him. Now John the Baptist, who beyond doubt was intended, prepared the way before Christ. (Notes, Is. xl. 2-3. Marg. Ref.) Then the Lord, (the same whom David called "his Lord," Ps. cx. 1;) whom they sought and expected, would come to his temple, or his own temple, which could not be fulfilled in Christ, unless he were the Lord, and Proprietor of the temple. (Note, Hag. ii. 7-9.) He would come suddenly, or immediately after his forerunner had announced his approach; and this he did, when he repeatedly cast out the buyers and sellers from it, and there daily preached to the people. He would be the Angel, or Messenger, of the covenant, even the new covenant of mercy and grace, when he came to mediate. In the prospect of his coming the Jews seemed to delight. "He is the person ye delight in, whose coming is so much desired, the time of it being the subject of your search and inquiry, and the expectation of it your comfort." (Louth.) But who among the people would be able to abide his coming, and stand the test of his doctrine, and the trying dispensations which would attend the setting up of his kingdom? For he would resemble the refiner's fire and the fuller's soap, and no hypocrite or wicked man could abide the test. He would sit as a refiner of gold and silver, to purify his Church and the hearts of his people from all dross; and thus he would prepare a pure race of ministers and a spiritual priesthood, (instead of the corrupt and rejected tribe of Levi,) who might present before him a holy worship, as pleasant to him as the services and sacrifices of the most eminent believers, in the purest times of the ancient Church.

V. 5, 6. (ii. 17.) The coming of Christ would be followed by the condemnation, and punishment of the Jewish nation. He would come among them as a witness, to testify that their works were evil; and thus he would speedily convict the sorcerers, and other notorious criminals, of which the bulk of the nation at that time principally consisted, (Marg. Ref.) and then he would bring them to condign punishment. The prevalence of these and similar crimes, indeed, caused the Jews to reject Christ and his holy Gospel, and thus brought on the ruin of the nation. Jehovah, being immutable in his nature and purposes, would not consume the nation till the Messiah was come: but then his immutable justice, holiness, and truth, required him to punish them for their enormous wickedness. The people might indeed imagine, that in the days of the Messiah the Lord would deal with them more leniently; as if he had not continue the same holy and just God as when he gave the law; (thus many nominal Christians seem heal their wounded consciences, their broken hearts, their spiritual maladies; and they went forth from the bondage of Satan, or the yoke of the ceremonial law, to grow up in knowledge and holiness, as calves grow strong and vigorous that are fed at the stall: and then they were made victorious and triumphant over all their wicked persecutors.

 The beams of this Sun have enlightened the nations, and the souls of all that fear God, ever since.

V. 4-6. Because the time was come, that the Jews should be destitute of prophets till the time of Christ; that they might with more fervent mind desire his coming, the prophet exhorteth them to exercise themselves diligently in studying the law of Moses in the mean season, whereby they might continue in the true religion, and also be armed against all temptations.—
 These verses intimate that the Jews were to expect no more prophets, till the forerunner of Christ appeared among them. They were therefore to attend to the law of Moses, and wait the Messiah's coming by the light of that dispensation. At length Elijah would come, (that is, John Baptist,) to introduce that glorious and terrible day of Christ. (Marg. Ref.) And his ministry would tend to turn the hearts of the fathers with the children to the Lord, to reconcile their discordant parties, by directing them all to Christ; or restore the degenerate children to the temper of their pious forefathers, that they might be owned as their posterity. And except this change took place, the Lord would come and smite the land with a curse. With this awful sentence the Old Testament concludes.—'He show-eth wherein John Baptist's office should stand; in the turning of men to God, and joining of the father and children in unity of faith; so that the father should turn to the religion of his son, that is, be converted to Christ; and the son shall embrace the faith of the true fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.' John Baptist, in many things, resembled Elijah, the intrepid, self-denying, and zealous reformer of Israel, in the days of Ahab. He came "in the spirit and power of Elijah," who was considered as the chief of the prophets, after Moses. The utter destruction of the Jewish nation—is here threatened, upon their rejecting the preaching of John Baptist, and refusing to hearken to his testimony concerning 'the Messias.' (Louth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Behold another day is coming, far more dreadful than any that hath gone before, to all the proud, and those that work wickedness! But the Sun of Righteousness now shines, to enlighten and bless all that fear the Lord: and the more we walk in his light and bask in his beams, the sooner will our souls be healed, and the more speedily shall we grow holy, fruitful, and happy. What then will be our felicity, when we go forth from the dungeon of this world, to rejoice and grow up in his immediate presence for evermore! Then all enemies will be put under our feet, and peace and joy unutterable will be our portion. Let others then boast in the darkness of their proud reasonings, and call it illumination: but let us keep near to that sacred word, through which this Sun of Righteousness shines upon the souls of his people: and, in the way of his ordinances and commandments, let us wait with patience the hour of our release; and cheerfully expect the great and dreadful, yet delightful day, when he shall come the second time to complete our salvation.
 But let all men observe, that, without their hearts are turned from sin and the world to Christ, to God, to peace, and holiness, they cannot escape the curse of his broken law, or enjoy the felicity of his chosen and redeemed people.
